Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will be aware of the serious events that took place in the Committee Corridor late yesterday afternoon. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), who is a cricketing friend of mine and has apologised to me, was one of the sponsors of a meeting in Committee Room 14. At the conclusion of that meeting, when those attending were not accompanied by any hon. Member, they refused to leave, thus preventing another meeting taking place, which I and some of my hon. Friends were planning to attend.

The Serjeant at Arms had to be informed, and a large number of police officers summoned. Hon. Members on both sides of the House were prevented from passing and re-passing the Committee Room on their way to and from other meetings in that Corridor. Worst of all, those attending the meeting, who were socialist militants, insisted on continuing, and not only to obstruct the business of this House, but to chant socialist slogans in a most offensive way. That exploded for ever the myth of new Labour.

I know that the hon. Member for Nottingham, South has written to you to apologise, and to indicate his stance on the matter. What steps will you take to ensure that hon. Members are aware that they never allow those they have invited into this place to remain in Committee Rooms unaccompanied by any hon. Member?

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) for raising this matter, and giving me the opportunity to repeat the apology that I made to you in writing last night, to hon. Members who booked the subsequent meetings, which were disrupted, and to the many hon. Members with whom I spoke in the corridors during what seemed to be a large part of yesterday evening.

I owe the House an apology and an explanation. The meeting was booked—

Madam Speaker: Order. No explanation is necessary. It is perfectly legitimate for hon. Members to book rooms in this House for a meeting. What disturbs the House and me is that the hon. Member responsible for those lobbyists did not see them off the premises. That is the point, and I think that the hon. Gentleman is giving some explanation and making an apology.

Mr. Simpson: Although I had made assiduous efforts to ensure that everyone came in properly, my error in failing to make the exit equally uneventful was seriously misjudged. I was the last to speak at the meeting, and left it only to inform the police and staff on the Corridor that I had been told that those attending were about to depart. My mistake was that I went down to the Lobby to pick up a full copy of the Budget briefing papers.

Only when I was then informed by the Serjeant at Arms that the meeting had not disbanded did I realise that I had not discharged my responsibilities fully and properly, and for that I apologise to the House in the way that I apologised to you last night.

Madam Speaker: That matter was brought to my attention at the time. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) and I have exchanged correspondence. He is left in no doubt as to what I feel about that neglect of duty yesterday. The matter is now closed.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester) rose—

Madam Speaker: Sit down. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South has apologised to the House and to me. I am sure that there are lessons to be drawn from that incident, and that it will not happen again.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (North Warwickshire): May I draw to your attention an incident in my constituency, on which I wish to raise a point of order, Madam Speaker? Coleshill high school in my constituency received an Office of Standards in Education report from the schools inspector. An attempt was made to withdraw the report a couple of days later, apparently because of some of the contents.

A second report was filed which had had some of the contents of the first report deleted. What was deleted was criticism of the Government.

Madam Speaker: Order. What is my responsibility in the matter?

Mr. O'Brien: I am just coming to exactly that point. The situation raises serious questions about the way in which such reports are prepared and about the whole process. Is it not exactly the sort of—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must come to my responsibility in the matter of this report.

Mr. O'Brien: Is it not exactly the sort of incident on which you should insist that the Secretary of State for Education and Employment should make an urgent statement, because it raises such profound issues?

Madam Speaker: I have no authority or influence over Ministers making statements. The hon. Gentleman has not raised a point of order; he has wasted the House's time. If a statement is to be made by a Minister, it is always on the annunciator—as today's three statements were—by 1 o'clock on the day that it is being made. Can we proceed with our business, or are there other bogus points of order?

Mr. Luff: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. This is not a bogus point of order. I am sure that the whole House will appreciate the apology offered by the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson)—

Hon. Members: Bogus!

Madam Speaker: Order. Allow me to deal with this. The hon. Gentleman will resume his seat for a moment.

Mr. Luff rose—

Madam Speaker: He will resume his seat. If he has a different point of order, I will of course hear it, but the other matter is now closed.

Mr. Luff: My understanding is that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) had also booked that Room, and I hope that you will draw his attention to what you have said about the other matter, and clarify to all hon. Members the fact that, when they make bookings, as the right hon. Member for Chesterfield also did, they have a responsibility—

Madam Speaker: Order.

BILL PRESENTED

Asylum and Immigration

Mr. Secretary Howard, supported by The Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Lilley, Mrs. Secretary Shephard, Mr. Secretary Hague and Miss Ann Widdecombe, presented a Bill to amend and supplement the Immigration Act 1971 and the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993; to make further provision with respect to immigrants and the employment of immigrants; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. [Bill 8.]

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming debate on Question [28 November].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply, acquisition or importation otherwise than by—

(i) zero-rating or exempting supplies of goods which are, or are to be, subjected to a fiscal or other warehousing regime; or

(ii) zero-rating or exempting supplies of services on or in relation to such goods;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax otherwise than to persons constructing or converting buildings in cases where the construction or conversion is not in the course of furtherance of a business;

(c) for varying any rate at which that tax is at any time chargeable; or

(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

Madam Speaker: I must put a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

6.11 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): The House may recall that in Easter this year the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the feel-good factor would probably not return for two years—until after the election. We now know what he meant, because the central challenge for the Budget—to acknowledge and tackle the real weaknesses of the British economy—was to encourage new and sustained investment, to close the investment gap with our competitors and to move people out of welfare into work and so reduce the huge bills for social security.

In yesterday's Budget, however, not only was there no significant encouragement for new investment, and no new plan to tackle unemployment, but the Chancellor had to report that, after 16 years of Conservative government—and after all the boasts of economic transformation—investment, three years into a recovery, is virtually stagnant, rising by only 1 per cent. this year. Public borrowing is now £7 billion above his estimates of the summer. It will be £10 billion higher next year and £10 billion higher the year after. Public finances are in such a poor state that even after a shocking 17 per cent. cut in public investment over the next three years and a 27 per cent. cut in the hospital building programme, he has had to admit that his best chance of balancing the Budget is probably not in this century but at the beginning of the next.

The Chancellor cannot, because he is imprisoned by his own economic failure, deliver the one measure that Conservative Members were demanding, and looking to for their job security: undoing the damage of the 7p tax rises since 1992.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): In view of his concerns over public finance, how would the hon. Gentleman finance the £8 billion cost of his 10 per cent. starting rate for income tax?

Mr. Brown: There is no £8 billion cost of a 10p starting rate for income tax. I will tell the hon. Gentleman what the choices will be at the next general election. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am answering the question. The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) has a few questions to answer to his constituents about the promises that he made about tax cuts that have never been delivered.

I will tell the hon. Gentleman what the choice at the next election will be: it will be between what the Chancellor said yesterday—the Conservative plan to abolish capital gains tax and inheritance tax, at a cost of more than £4 billion to benefit only a few—and our proposals to use the same resources to get the starting rate of income tax down to 15 per cent., or preferably 10 per cent. I know what choice, on fairness grounds and on employment grounds, the electorate will make.

This is not just the 7p up and 1p down Budget. It is not just the Budget that gives—as I will show in a minute—with one hand but takes with another. The Government cannot present the Budget as inspiring, as a turning point or as the 17th relaunch—for it would have been the 17th failed relaunch—so they now to try to salvage it and present it as cautious, sensible and prudent.

Prudence would have meant that the Chancellor tackled our deep-seated economic weaknesses, that he had a long-term strategy while being cautious in the here and now, but there is no sign at all from his Budget that he has any sense of direction or strategy for the British economy. He cannot be considered prudent if he neither acknowledges nor addresses the fundamental investment and skills gap with our competitors and has no clear direction for this country. He is not a prudent Chancellor with real scope and options that he can consider and reject, for what he calls his prudence is forced on him. He is a man without real choices, a prisoner of his Government's failure, paralysed into inaction as a result of everything that has happened to the economy under Conservative management for the past 16 years.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): The hon. Gentleman has talked about the need for investment. How will his party's policies to sign up to the social chapter and have a statutory minimum wage help investment? They will ruin investment, especially in manufacturing, and destroy jobs.

Mr. Brown: It is interesting that the same question that was asked of me last week has been asked this week by a different hon. Member who was not here last week. I will repeat what I said. Britain has slipped from 13th to 18th in the world prosperity league. Of the 17 countries ahead of us, 16 have a minimum wage. The hon. Gentleman must face up to the fact that there is a minimum level of social justice that contributes to economic efficiency in modern economies. The idea that we should return to a 19th century situation, where there is no protection at all for people in the workplace, is unacceptable to this country.

The result of everything that has happened is that after 21 tax rises—the biggest tax rises in history—with, even this year, as was admitted in a recent report, living standards for the majority still falling, with consumer confidence still weak because of widespread job insecurity and despite all the promises of the Conservatives being the low-tax party, all the Chancellor can offer to undo the damage of a 7p in the pound tax rise from 1992 is to make it a 6p tax rise from 1996.

People will ask, "What has all the suffering been for?" It has been for one solitary tax cut that cannot mitigate a record of 21 tax rises. Big tax rises followed by a small tax cut still equal a big tax rise since 1992. A tax cut one year in five cannot undo the damage of tax rises in the other years. Three billion pounds given away cannot compensate for more than £16 billion that has been taken away.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): The hon. Gentleman says that the 1 per cent. reduction in the standard rate is the only progress that is being made on tax reductions, but that it is not true. There are two other respects in which we shall be moving towards a 20p rate. The tax on savings is to be reduced to 20p, at a cost of £800 million. Will he support that?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman raises what the Deputy Prime Minister said immediately after the Budget. The Deputy Prime Minister was sent into the television studios to tell people that they were £9 a week better off as a result of the Budget, but when the Treasury press release was examined immediately afterwards, it turned out that £6.50 of the £9 was an assumption that people were getting a 4 per cent. pay rise and that the tax changes added up to a fraction of the £9 that was mentioned. Taken overall, all the tax changes made by the Chancellor are worth little more than £2 a week to the ordinary family. Many people's savings have been destroyed by the Government; the hon. Gentleman should face up to that fact.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest) rose—

Mr. Brown: No, I will not give way to the hon. Member for Gravesham again. I will give way to the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), and then I shall continue my speech.

Mr. Coombs: The hon. Gentleman talked about savings, but what destroys savings are the inflation rates—about 26 per cent.—that we had under the last Labour Government. Will he tell the House what his target inflation rate would be?

Mr. Brown: I thought that the hon. Gentleman would ask about the 40 per cent. increase in unemployment in his constituency in the past five years. I will tell him about inflation. We have said very clearly that we will set an inflation target. We shall consult the Governor of the Bank of England and set that rate in government.

The Chancellor must now explain his inflation target. Is it 2.5 per cent.? If it is, he has gone beyond it and he has failed to meet it this year. There is no guarantee that he will meet it in future years. I thought that the Chancellor might tell us that his inflation target is 1 to 4 per cent., but now he is telling us that it is 2.5 per cent. That is very similar to the memo that he sent to Back Benchers, in which he said that he might meet the 1 to 4 per cent. target on some, but not all, occasions.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I did not intend to intervene, but I shall answer the question. The target is 2.5 per cent. by the end of the Parliament and we are on course to achieve it. As I said yesterday, the target will be 2.5 per cent. for the rest of the Parliament. The Chancellor, and not the Governor of the Bank of England, is supposed to set that target. Why cannot the hon. Gentleman answer any of the perfectly legitimate questions that my hon. Friends have put to him? What will he do in the vote on the tax on savings, what inflation target will he set and what is the cost of his proposal for a 10p basic rate?

Mr. Brown: I have answered all those questions. I thought that, after last night, hon. Members would be more anxious to question the Chancellor about what he has done and what he has failed to do.

I have made it absolutely clear that we shall consult the Governor of the Bank of England on the inflation target when in government. That is the sensible thing to do. The Chancellor must explain why inflation this year is at 3 per cent. when his inflation target is 2.5 per cent. The Governor of the Bank of England says that he has no confidence that the Chancellor will meet the target by the end of the Parliament.

I will remind hon. Members about taxation. Despite all the promises of tax cuts, year on year, the tax cuts in the Budget leave value added tax at 17.5 per cent. and VAT on fuel at 8 per cent. Employees' national insurance contributions have risen since the last election and they have not been reduced. Mortgage assistance has been halved and it remains unchanged. The airport tax and home contents insurance tax have not been reduced. Anything that the Chancellor has given this year must be set against what he has taken away. After VAT rises, national insurance rises, cuts in mortgage help, cuts in the married man's allowance and new airport and car taxes, people are almost £700 worse off under the Conservative Government. Having taken the pounds, they are returning only the pennies. People have suffered enough as a result of the Government's actions.

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk) rose—

Mr. Brown: I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman. He is a distinguished former Treasury Minister and I doubt whether he agrees with many of the things that have happened since he left the Treasury.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall make my speech in my own way, thank you very much. We know that the hon. Gentleman has already committed himself to substantial public expenditure increases. Would he reverse the tax measures that he has just mentioned? Would they become tax reductions if he were in power?

Mr. Brown: I have committed the Labour party to one measure: the employment and training programme. We would fund that measure—just as the Chancellor should have—with a windfall tax charge on the profits of the privatised utilities. When the Chancellor speaks at the end of the debate, he will have to explain why the Conservative party is always a soft touch for the privatised utilities.

Let us be clear that what the Chancellor gave yesterday he also took away. The tax cut will be paid for by a council tax rise of 11 per cent.—if our calculations are correct—in some parts of the country. Water charges and rents have increased and there are hidden taxes. Rail fares are up, as are prescription and dental charges. The Chancellor and the Deputy Prime Minister have claimed that we are £9 a week better off. Some people will be better off by £9 a week, but the Chancellor will have to scour the country looking for a whisky-drinking, vintage-car-owning pensioner who is looking for community care and who has assets of between £8,000 and £16,000. Very few people are better off in real terms as a result of the Budget.

On the fairness of the Chancellor's proposals, it has been reported today that—after all the benefits that they have received—the richest 10 per cent. will gain £7.30 per week and the poorest 40 per cent. will gain only £1.04 per week after the Budget changes.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) because he is a Liberal Democrat.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He says that he is concerned about the rise in council tax, which has occurred because of the Chancellor's sleight of hand in putting pressure on local authorities to finance the education budget. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the education money would be better provided from the 1p income tax cut? Will he join the Liberal Democrats in voting against that 1p reduction, which we believe should go to education?

Mr. Brown: When the hon. Gentleman makes his contribution to the debate this afternoon, I should be grateful if he would confirm whether he agrees that the assisted places scheme should be scrapped and the money used to reduce class sizes. That is an important change. I should also be grateful if he would tell us whether the Liberal party will go to the next election promising a rise in the basic rate of income tax, as he hinted in his speech yesterday.

Mr. Bruce: We will tell the hon. Gentleman at the general election. I asked him a simple question. He and his colleagues have said that they want to put money into education and that they do not wish to increase council taxes. We have pledged to vote against the 1p reduction in income tax this year—has he?

Mr. Brown: Never has an intervention been more telling. The Liberal party spokesman is not prepared to say whether he will go to the next election promising a tax rise. That would be the honest position of a party that has pledged to vote on Monday against the tax changes.

Let us examine what the changes mean for ordinary people throughout the country. Hon. Members will recall that the Chancellor told us that the tax rises since 1992 should not be exaggerated. He said that, for most people, they amounted to little more than the price of three pints of beer a week. Staying with the pub economy—which the Chancellor finds so congenial and of which he is an acknowledged master—and using the same equivalents, we find that the weekly sums from the tax cuts that he announced yesterday will amount to fewer than two or three packets of peanuts. That is the equivalent of what the Chancellor has done.

Let us recall what the Chancellor told the Conservative party conference only a few weeks ago. Do hon. Members remember what he said to earn the traditional crouching ovation that he gets at such events? He said:

"It is a Budget I'm looking forward to a lot more than the last two.

Many of you feel, I know, that the time has come for some reward in the Budget.

So far this Parliament we have given you the hors d'oeuvres and not the main course, the trailer not the film, the warm-up not the main performance".

I can tell the Chancellor that, as a result of yesterday's Budget statement, we have gone straight from the hors d'oeuvres to paying the bill without receiving the main course. We have gone from the trailer to the end credits. People are walking out and there is still no main feature. We have gone from the warm-up to the final curtain, and nothing that the Chancellor has done is worth a single round of applause.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): The hon. Gentleman said that nothing that the Chancellor did yesterday was worthy of support, but I remind him that his leader pledged his support for the 1p reduction in income tax. Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whether he believes that that 1p reduction should be financed by less public spending or higher borrowing?

Mr. Brown: I will tell the hon. Gentleman what we shall do. We shall not vote against the 1p cut in income tax; and I will tell him why. People have suffered enough; they have been punished enough by the Conservative Government.

I find it interesting that Conservatives—not only Conservative Members of Parliament, but Conservatives in the country—now spend all their time writing to the Labour party. One of my colleagues received his Budget representations, not from his local Labour club, but from Middlesbrough Conservative Club Ltd., founded in 1883. The letter started:

"The Management Committee of this club are becoming increasingly concerned about the falling trade which has been apparent for some months now. We know that we are not alone in the immediate vicinity. Trade is down by some 8 per cent. throughout the licensing trade in the region. My Committee will be obliged if you will bring this matter to the attention of anyone you think can influence the situation."

So little faith do they now have in Conservative Members that even Conservative clubs find it necessary to write to the Labour party with their Budget representations.

What of the fundamental problems that should have been tackled in the Budget, the original causes of the tax increases—the neglect of investment and the failure to get people back to work? After 16 years of promises of economic miracles, what has been done about the central challenges to arrest the decline from 13th to 18th place in the world prosperity league? Where is the investment-rich economy that the Government promised? There has been only a 1 per cent. increase in investment this year, in spite of a promise of a 6 per cent. increase in the summer.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I will not give way again. I have given way a dozen times to Conservative Members and none of them—[Interruption.] In spite of their barracking, none of them has acknowledged that they should be returning to their constituents to apologise for what has happened as a result of the Budget.

We have the slowest increase in investment out of recession since the 1930s, yet there was not one measure, apart from those previously announced, that the Chancellor could genuinely say directly gives attention to spurring investment forward.

If the Government had been serious, they would have introduced the investment allowances that we proposed in our pre-Budget submission. If they had been serious about infrastructure investment and helping the housing market, they would have considered the phased release of capital receipts to allow local authorities to build. Instead of improving the prospects for investment, however, they have cut public investment.

Mr. Robathan rose—

Mr. Brown: I will not give way again.

[Mr. Brown]

What do the Government offer in its place? The private—

Mr. Legg: Will the hon. Gentleman try to answer one question?

Mr. Brown: I have given way many more times than most Ministers are prepared to, and Conservative Members are intent on not allowing me to make my remarks; they are simply trying to disrupt them.

What do the Government offer in place of the cuts in public investment? They offer the 10th relaunch of the private finance initiative, and not a plan or a programme but a wish list.

The Chancellor should listen to this. He failed, during three years of the private finance initiative, to deliver projects worth the original sum of £15 billion and delivered only £1 billion—a fraction of what was promised. Having failed to deliver his promise, the right hon. and learned Gentleman simply makes more promises and announces the possibility of 1,000 projects, at a cost of £25 billion. Is it not typical of the Government to seize on the manifest failure of their private finance programme, declare it a resounding success and move it right to the centre of their plans for the future without any sign of how they will repair the failures of the past three years?

The small print reveals that this is not a programme but an open-ended list of unlikelihood, offering not a plan but what the Budget press statement calls merely a list of potential partnerships that have been identified. What started as an initiative, followed by the formation of a panel and then a panel executive, has now become simply the announcement of an action plan that will come later.

Where has that taken us? A car park in Eastbourne; the unpopular Skye bridge. The jewel in the crown appears to be a hospital incinerator built in Hillingdon, which is now the subject of complaints about toxic emissions and is being used by Blue Circle Industries plc more than by local hospitals. Beyond that, we are given castles in the air, when people want projects on the ground.

Private companies in the construction industry and elsewhere are now longing for the task force, the statement of priorities and the clear commitment to action that the Labour party offers.

If the Chancellor wants an example of what has happened to the private finance initiative, he need look no further than the channel tunnel rail link. It was launched as a project in 1986, legislation was promised in 1987 and finance promised from the Government in 1993. The bids have yet to be assessed and the builders have yet to be agreed. In September, the Government finally took a decision; they appointed a negotiator to consult and then discuss with prospective bidders. There is no signature and no start, almost 10 years on. Now, as the French travel on their high-speed link, completed before the tunnel was opened, the British link may not be completed until next century—the year 2002.

Mr. Hawkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I will not give way any more.

What of crossrail? It was first promised in January 1989, the Government gave the go-ahead in 1990 and this year, 1995, it is at risk because of the costs of rail privatisation.

Public money for the railways should be used not to fund expensive consultancies and the subsidies that will accompany privatisation but to invest in rail transport.

Why not use money from the venture capital trust and the European investment scheme budget, which has not been taken up, to invest and help small businesses move ahead? Why not bring new technology into schools under competition proposals that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has made?

What is happening to employment under the Government? The best way to save money in the long run is to tackle the £20 billion bill that is the cost of unemployment. The biggest barrier to sorting out our public finances is the billions being poured down the black hole to pay the costs of unemployment.

Perhaps the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will draw the House's attention to what he said in his pamphlet, "Changing Gear: What the Government should do next" before he landed up at the Treasury. As we are discussing public investment, let me read what he said:

"In the public sector, a wide range of public investment should be undertaken. Amongst the investment undertaken should be house-building, renovation, insulation aimed at inner-city areas in part at least, road building, other infrastructure work, telecommunications and school equipment."

The right hon. Gentleman said that it would be sensible to think that £4 billion to £5 billion would be spent on capital projects in the next two years. He continued:

"If such a policy combined with other less expensive initiatives we suggest elsewhere on training and social policy were to be vigorously pursued, the atmosphere as well as the real economy might well be different at the time of the election, and if we lost, we would at least not have landed ourselves with the permanent stigma of apparent callousness and inaction"— exactly the stigma that now threatens to attach itself to the Conservative party as a result of the huge cuts in capital investment for which the Chief Secretary and Chancellor are now responsible. I will tell them how they might begin to tackle the problem. They might do so by adopting our plans to reduce unemployment, especially youth unemployment and long-term unemployment.

What do the Government do instead? They scrap the community action programme, which was launched two years ago by the then Chancellor in the Budget and which was helping 100,000 people a year. They cut the training budget by 4 per cent.—I am not surprised that the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is now not to speak in this week's Budget debate—and, of course, by freezing it, they scrap the one-parent benefit, which provides an incentive for single parents to return to work. They are making it increasingly difficult for single mothers to take up employment again.

What should the Government have done? They should have introduced our employment programme, and they should have paid for it with the windfall tax on the utilities. If anyone has any doubt about the case for such a tax, they should look at the profit made by Yorkshire Water. It has increased its profit by 50 per cent.—not by supplying the people of Yorkshire with water, but by not supplying them. [Interruption.] Conservative Members are well aware that the plans to take away the supply of many people in Yorkshire are still on the table, and could be introduced. But how can they defend circumstances in which the profits of Yorkshire Water have doubled, while the service that it is providing is the subject of massive criticism—even from constituents who normally support the Conservative party?

This Budget is a survival package for the Government, and it has failed. It does not begin to tackle the underlying weaknesses. It does not tackle the investment gap with our competitors; it does not tackle the skills gap, because there is no new measure to deal with post-school training for young people other than the measure to deal with single parents, as the one-parent benefit has been cut.

In my view and, I believe, in the country's view, the Government have run out of steam and given up on the future. They are not prudent; they are paralysed and powerless—frozen in the headlights of the oncoming election. This is the Budget of a Government who are now a prisoner of failure. The public are not short-sighted, greedy, gullible, easily fooled or forgetful of what has happened. The public do not want to praise this Government: they want to bury them.

This is a Budget that marks not the beginning of the Conservative party's fight back, but the irrevocable public exposure of its terminal decline. It will be seen not as the brave new launch, the turning point for victory, but as the last-gasp effort of a decaying regime.

After this Budget, the public know as they have never known before that the long night of Conservative rule is drawing to a close. It is the Budget of a Government with nowhere to go and a Chancellor with nothing left to offer. This Government are in terminal decline: they should go, and go soon.

6.42 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. William Waldegrave): I always enjoy the speeches of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). That was not one of his vintage contributions, but I was very flattered when he referred to my elderly pamphlet, produced in 1980. I recommend its approach to my hon. Friends on the Back Benches; it was moderately troublesome to the Government of the day, and shortly afterwards I was given a job. I consider that quite a good way of proceeding.

I think that the pamphlet makes me look rather good. It sounded rather moderate to me. Given the investment figures in those programmes of the 1980s, the Government have a very good record. And, if we are to go back into the past, we cannot fail to remind the hon. Gentleman that he came to the House on a CND manifesto. Opposition Members always get cross when we remind them of that, but it strikes me as a more fundamental shift in political stance than any that I have made.

The Budget has three main themes. It keeps spending down, keeping borrowing on its downward path and protecting high-priority programmes; it sets Britain on a course of cutting taxes in a sustainable way; and—through the £700 gain in real income that the average family has experienced since the last election; some £450 will probably be added next year—it continues, in a plausible way, our campaign to reform the way in which government works, so that the state does less but new partnerships are built with the private sector.

First, let me deal with spending and borrowing. The Budget keeps borrowing on a clear downward path by keeping tight control on public spending. Lower borrowing will keep pressure off interest rates. That is good news for business, investment, home owners and, above all, jobs. I am sure that the House will be pleased to learn that three building societies have cut their mortgage rates this afternoon; that shows that they support the climate of confidence produced by my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget.

We have made tough decisions to return public finances to a sound footing. Borrowing always goes up in a recession, but once the recession is over the test of a Government is the Government's ability to ensure that it goes down again. That is what we are doing. We have done it before. We inherited an unsustainable level of public borrowing in 1979. There was a tough Budget in 1981. My noble Friend Lord Howe—ignoring 364 economists, the Labour party and everyone else—tackled the public sector borrowing requirement head on. The consequence was one of the longest periods of growth that we had experienced since the war.

We are now doing the same. We are already in the fourth year of a period of sustained growth—the steadiest for a generation. Exports are doing extremely well: last year we increased our share of world trade, which is very unusual. Businesses are investing: contrary to what was said by the hon. Gentleman, manufacturing investment was up 12 per cent. this year. As for business investment, an increase of 9 per cent. is forecast for next year. Living standards are improving, and unemployment is falling—and all that is happening without an increase in inflation.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): What is the reason for the continued decline in sterling?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman should ask the markets. We do not have targets for sterling. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman would like to set some targets; would he like sterling to be higher, or lower?

Mr. Anderson rose—

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman will find that there are benefits as well as costs. What matters is the inflation target, and the inflation target will be met. I do not think that serious commentators are in much doubt about that.

We intend to lower the public sector borrowing requirement further. Our goal is clear: we intend to bring the budget back towards balance over the medium term. We have done that before, and we will do it again. Balance should be achieved at the end of the decade; the current balance will be in surplus a year or so earlier.

Sound public finances cannot just mean ever higher taxes to balance ever higher spending. That is the fundamental difference between Conservative and Opposition Members. We believe that, when the businesses and workers of the country create wealth, it belongs to them. It is their right to keep what they make; Government must take only the minimum that is needed to provide decent services and the essential functions of government.

The Labour party used—honourably and openly—to believe the opposite: that far more should be done and financed collectively, and less left to the individual. As the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) put it in an eloquent speech in the debate on the Gracious Speech, it should be done less by profit and more by collective will. That is, after all, what the political argument has been about for 200 years or so. Now, however, things are alleged to be different. As The Independent recently put it, elegantly,

"The British Left have at last returned, snout-first, to the politics of the pork barrel".

That was the view of Niall Ferguson. New Labour claims to want even lower taxes than we do, but with no theory and philosophy to explain it. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) can prove to me that Niall Ferguson was writing in The Daily Telegraph, I shall withdraw what I said at once.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): The article to which the right hon. Gentleman refers was written by Niall Ferguson, but it was not the view of The Independent. Niall Ferguson is a commentator, and he is entitled to his view. The right hon. Gentleman should not suggest that the newspaper, editorially, took that view.

Mr. Waldegrave: That strikes me as the feeblest intervention of the afternoon. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to point out a serious mistake. Muddling up The Daily Telegraph and The Independent would have been a serious mistake. I do not think that Opposition Members like what Niall Ferguson wrote.

Labour has now joined in the competition for low taxes, but it has no ideology, no theory and no idea of what that is for. We had about £1 billion of extra spending from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), who opposed all the savings that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security had made. I think that that is the way in which Labour is proceeding. Its practice is to oppose and sneer at all the savings, and to tell the lobby groups that it is against them, but then to back off and, when its members have lunch with people in the City, say that that was not spending.

For us, the Budget process starts with the tight control of public spending. We have always fought to keep state spending down. We have always believed that one can provide the services that people want without putting an intolerable strain on the taxpayer. We have always linked that to our fundamental political belief: that in the end big government is not only inefficient but threatens freedom. We do not—as the Opposition do—collect shopping lists of expensive commitments from the lobbyists and pressure groups and then ask the taxpayer to foot the bill. We start with the taxpayer.

In July, the Cabinet asked the special committee on public spending—EDX—to re-examine public spending. We did so. We found savings. They were not easy. There is very little Government spending that does not have some defender or nothing to be said in its favour, or the House would not have voted it in the first place. But we succeeded.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): The Red Book tells us that public expenditure is to go down by £3.25 billion. Elsewhere, reserves have gone down by £3.2 million. Are we not left with dangerously low reserves? What if the money that is supposed to be saved on social security fraud does not materialise?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is a perfectly fair point to probe, but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is right. We have not broken the reserve in any recent years. This year the underspend looks like being about £750 million or £800 million. We thought carefully about a reasonable figure for the reserve, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we have one.

We succeeded in finding public spending savings. My two predecessors did not make my task easier; they had helped the Chancellor to cut projected public spending in his previous two Budgets by £43 billion. None the less, in this year's public spending round, we have gone further and the total has gone up to £53 billion.

For 1997-98 alone, we cut the public spending control total by £3.2 billion from the ceilings that the Cabinet endorsed at the start of the spending round. That is about 1 per cent. in real terms. It is also £12 billion lower than when we first set plans for that year, two Budgets ago. This year, we predict an underspend of about £$\frac{1}{4}$ billion. Spending this year will be only about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a per cent. higher in real terms than in 1994-95. Over the whole period of the public expenditure survey, our plans represent tighter spending control than at any time since just after the war, when the Attlee Government were demobilising.

Doing it this way—by real spending control—means that tax cuts are sustainable. In fact, spending controls bring a double benefit: they let people keep more of what they earn; but they also mean government that is smaller, more efficient and less of a burden on people and industry.

As a result of the drive to greater efficiency, we have been able to cut the cash cost of running Government in each of the next three years. Compared with £15.1 billion this year, next year we will spend £300 million less on Government running costs, the year after £530 million less and the year after that £860 million less—a cash cut of more than 5 per cent. In real terms, the figures are even more impressive. By 1998-99, the annual cost of the civil service will be nearly £2 billion—more than 12 per cent.—lower in real terms than today.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): If public expenditure and the cost of the civil service are going down so dramatically, why, in a written answer that I received today, has the cost of chauffeurs for Ministers gone up by 50 per cent. since 1991? Will the Chief Secretary set an example and occasionally catch the bus?

Mr. Waldegrave: That sounds like a good subject for a Chief Secretary to look at, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his helpful indication of where I might look for further savings in next year's expenditure round.

The savings that we have made will not reduce standards of public services. The citizens charter and the competing for quality review have shown that standards can rise with lower costs. We have already carried out 1,000 competing for quality reviews across Government, covering 70,000 staff. More than £1 billion-worth of business has been won by the private sector, with significant reductions in the costs to the taxpayer. The programme of fundamental expenditure reviews and senior management reviews have led to 20 per cent. cuts in senior staff in major Departments and contributed to the drive for greater efficiency across Whitehall. Other reductions come from better procurement, rationalising functions and reducing the span of Government through privatisation.

Those reductions build on the Government's considerable success in the fight against excessive bureaucracy: holding down running costs and the number of civil servants. There are now 506,000 civil servants—fewer than at any time since the war, 65,000 lower than at the previous election and more than 30 per cent. lower than in 1979. Numbers will continue to fall as a result of those reductions and should be well below 500,000 next year.

I heard the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central mutter about quangos—quite rightly. They are the next target. Central Departments are just one part of the Government machine that we are committed to modernise. Circling each Department are large numbers of satellite bodies, which are commonly described as quangos. They come in all shapes and sizes. Some spend money and run programmes on behalf of Ministers. Some provide services themselves. Some are regulatory and raise income from fees. The great majority consume taxpayers' money.

The Government have already had considerable success in reducing the number of quangos and improving the efficiency of those that remain, but we intend to make further efforts. We shall review the way in which the administration costs of quangos are controlled. We need to ensure that they are exposed to the same discipline as Departments. We shall consider the scope for further reducing the number of quangos. All are at present subject to periodic review. That process will continue. But we shall look at them in groups to see whether there can be overlaps that can involve removal of whole organisations. We shall help Departments with the effective management of quangos. The efficiency unit in the Cabinet Office will undertake a scrutiny aimed at generating practical guidance on how to improve that efficiency.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East spoke about the private finance initiative, and my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, who leads on that subject, has been talking about the PFI today. In 1979, the public sector was the owner of many loss-making industries, nationalised by Labour after the war, and which Government should never have owned. Our privatisation programme transformed many of them into efficient world-beating companies, like the present British Steel. Today, we face the challenge of achieving similar improvements in services that the Government have a duty to provide, services for which we must keep responsibility: roads, hospitals, prisons, and a whole range of other things. That is where the PFI can be extremely powerful.

That policy is now central to the next stage of the reform of government in Britain. Government are often not the best manager and provider of services, whether they are people-intensive or capital-intensive. A huge prize of more efficient provision, giving better value for money, is available if we can harness business management expertise at every stage, to design, build, finance and operate public services. This gives an opportunity to free the public sector to do the things that it is best at, for example, an NHS that is focused on core clinical services rather than the maintenance of boilers and the management of car parks.

The PFI is gathering momentum and projects are demonstrating good results. We will have about £5 billion-worth of deals signed by the end of this financial year. The scepticism—as exhibited by Opposition Front-Bench Members—that accompanied its growth has been just like that in the early 1980s on privatisation. Opposition Front-Bench Members will find that the programme will work and, in due course, they will probably come to support it. [Interruption.] As they say, some of them support it already. Some of them advocate it, and one even claims to have invented it—the deputy leader of the Labour party.

We are on course to deliver projects that are worth about £5 billion by the end of March, and there is much more to come. It is not just about capital spending; it is about making the Government more and more a purchaser of public services rather than a provider of capital assets. But even as it is, the policy will maintain publicly sponsored capital at about £22½ billion a year through the survey period—a level, which, in real terms, is higher than almost at any time in the 1980s.

The other reform relates to the extension of challenge funding, which builds partnerships with local authorities, private business and the voluntary sector. Challenge funding has already been a formidable success in tackling urban regeneration, adding £1 of private money to every £1 of public money invested. We want to see that continue and have announced third and fourth rounds of bidding for the single regeneration budget. Challenge funding has also been successful in the Home Office, in its town centre video camera campaign. That is why we are announcing plans to extend it into the regeneration of deprived housing estates; local employment enterprise and training initiatives by the training and enterprise councils; a new challenge fund for the renewal, repair, improvement or replacement of school buildings; and establishing a network of centres to raise standards of literacy and numeracy.

Happily, my job is not all about cuts, though cuts are an important part of good government. Good government is also about priorities and ensuring that money goes where it is needed. For example, the Budget demonstrates our commitment to schools. In total, we will increase provision for schools by almost £880 million. Our plans will extend quality and choice in education by funding, among other things, a major new initiative on nursery vouchers, a doubling of the intake of the assisted places scheme, and enabling banks to offer subsidised loans to students.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Will the Chief Secretary confirm that the bulk of the expenditure is to be provided through local authority funding rather than direct Government funding, and that the Government's proposed allocation to local authorities represents no increase in real terms compared with last year? Is not the net effect that education funding will have to come from cuts in local services and an increase in council tax?

Mr. Waldegrave: There are two separate issues. There is a large increase in central Government grant—the aggregate external finance grant—of almost £1 billion and there is an increase in standard spending assessments. The hon. Gentleman should wait for the Secretary of State for the Environment's statement tomorrow. It will be possible for all education authorities to spend the increase on schools, whatever their budget.

We are launching two new challenge funds to lever in private money to improve school buildings. As I have said, we have £880 million more for schools. The two principal English Opposition parties—to my knowledge the same thing is happening in Scotland—have been—

Mr. Gordon Brown: Not in Scotland.

Mr. Waldegrave: No doubt, different things have been going on in Scotland. The two Opposition parties have been co-ordinating campaigns in the English counties, and probably in Scottish counties, on education spending. I am sure that most of my hon. Friends will have noticed such campaigning.

We have provided £880 million more and it is fair to ask whether the Opposition want to provide more or less. Perhaps the Labour party wants to provide less because it is now a tax-cutting party. It is now outbidding us on tax cuts, so it might want to spend less. Does it want to spend more? That is a fair question. The Member for Dunfermline, East walked straight past all the questions asked by my hon. Friends and I expect that he will walk straight past this one. Does he want to spend more than £880 million on schools this year? That is not a difficult question, but I do not think that we will get an answer.

The same is happening on crime. Since we came to office, spending on law and order has more than doubled in real terms. Over the past two years, recorded crime has fallen significantly for the first time in modern years. That is no accident. Police manpower has increased by over 20 per cent. since 1979. Our plans provide for a further 5,000 policemen on the beat over the next three years and almost 4,000 extra prison places. We have consistently backed the police since 1979 and the Budget does so again.

Can anyone believe that Labour would spend more? Would it spend less? Will we get an answer? I think that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East nodded. That may be a spending pledge on the police. We should note it. He is now shaking his head, so I think that pledge has been withdrawn.

Our other consistent priority has been health. Next year, current spending on the NHS will go up by about £1.3 billion—over 1.6 per cent. in real terms. The private finance initiative will bring in at least an additional £165 million in private sector investment. I expect it will bring in even more. As always, the NHS will keep what it can save. The hospitals' target in efficiency gains next year is 3 per cent. or £650 million. That means about £2 billion in a tight spending year in extra resources for patients in the national health service. That is the mark of our commitment.

Every Labour spokesman competes with us on health spending. However, when the Labour party was in government, it cut nurses' pay. It is the only party in the history of the NHS to cut spending in real terms. The only year that that has happened since the foundation of the health service was 1977-78. However, our record on health spending is better—we beat the Labour party on health spending. We can do that only because we are tougher on spending on lower priorities. The hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) said as recently as last year that she wanted to spend—rather like the Liberals on education—the product of a penny on income tax on the NHS.

Ms Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): We did not say that.

Mr. Waldegrave: I did not mean "we"; the hon. Member for Bristol, South herself said that she would like to spend the product of 1p on income tax, or about £1.6 billion, on the health service. Since she is now in the Treasury team, she has forgotten about that. She has blotted it out of her memory. The remarkable transformation in the political position of the hon. Member for Bristol, South has been observed with astonishment by those of us in other parts of Bristol in the past few years.

Ms Primarolo: Read out the quotation then.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will send the quotation to the hon. Lady. The Government have a clear strategy. [Interruption.] The hon. Lady is presumably saying that she does not want more spending on health.

Ms Primarolo: That is not the point.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is the point. Does the Labour Front-Bench team want more spending on health or not? I may be mistaken that a couple of years ago the hon. Lady wanted more spending on health. I thought I was complimenting her because as she was—and still is in reality—a good tough left-wing politician, she would have wanted more spending on health. I am now told that I have misquoted her. I apologise and I withdraw that. The hon. Lady did not want any more spending on health. I entirely withdraw those allegations. We are none the wiser as to whether the Labour Front-Bench team wants more spending on health. We will not learn that.

The Budget, like its predecessors, is a Budget for jobs and growth. We are keeping public spending down as a share of GDP and keeping taxes down. We believe that that is the way to get more jobs, a more secure economy and better prospects of sustained growth. We point to the success of the economies that follow that line. Keeping public spending down is fiscally responsible; it continues the process of lifting the total burden of government from industry; it helps to make employing people cheaper; it helps incentives for work by taking many of the lower-paid out of tax; it cuts the burden on small business; and it makes Britain Europe's enterprise centre.

There is a counter-argument. Some honest and intelligent people take a different view; they include the right hon. Member for Chesterfield and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), as I read in the Evening Standard. People such as Professor Layard and Professor Wynn Godley take a different position. They argue that higher spending, even with higher tax, will achieve what is needed better. That is a perfectly logical and coherent position, but one with which the Government disagree. That is the ever-present argument between left and right.

We have not heard those counter-arguments today from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. We have heard no alternative political position whatever. All that we have had is the Labour party advocating more spending when it talks to the lobbies; less spending when it talks to the City and it wants to look respectable; and income tax at 10 per cent. when it talks to the media. That fools no one.

There are two explanations for what Labour is up to. The first is that it has not really changed its policy at all, but knows that it cannot be elected if it shows its true high-spending colours. That is what the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) hopes when she says that she wants

"Labour to win and Gordon can say anything he likes if he thinks that it is going to win the election; but when Labour is in power they will be looking for other priorities apart from tax cuts."

That is what the hon. Lady hopes and believes, but that ascribes such low motives to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East and to the Labour party that I cannot subscribe to it.

The second interpretation is less Machiavellian and more charitable and therefore the one that I believe. It is that Labour simply has no idea of the implications of what it is doing or saying. All that matters is to look good, like Robert Redford in the film "The Candidate". The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East would be splendid in the role. He might lose a little weight, but he would look very good. The Labour party just strings out the soundbites and who cares if they are contradictory. Like the great Tom Lehrer's song on Wernher von Braun: "Once the soundbites are up who cares where they come down. That's not my department says Gordon von Brown."

Let us compare a few soundbites. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) said on the private finance initiative:

"It is a privatisation initiative. Its not privatisation by the back door, its privatisation by the front door."

That is for the scares on health privatisation. On the other hand, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said:

"The PFI is right in principle. We have supported it, and in many ways we have been advocating it.—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1077.]

The right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said, "We initiated it." Those are the soundbites for the City and commentators. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has said

"We also see limited application in provision"—

he is being very statesmanlike here—

"for private finance for publicly-led projects in education and health."

That is not what the hon. Member for Peckham says.

The soundbite for those who want tax cuts is "7p up for 1p down". That is a neat slogan. But when it comes to spending, they want more on every major programme, as we heard again today. Do they want to cut borrowing faster or slower? They do not know.

We have just heard the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East promise to do away with a list of taxes which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor had to introduce to bring public borrowing down. He liked none of them, and we had lots of nods and winks that they would all go. Where would the money come from? Having given itself such a contradictory set of slogans, no wonder that the best that new Labour can do is to abstain on the principal issue of this Budget: our judgment that the time has come to return to lower taxes. That is the result of new Labour. It is firmly based on new principles, but when it comes to the big issue, it manages to come to the decisive conclusion to abstain. That is wonderful.

I shall be interested to see whether Labour Members abstain on the cutting of whisky and beer duties. I expect that they will. We had no answers because they have not decided what to do, which is rather surprising. Nor have Labour Members decided what they will do about the 20p savings rate of tax. They walked straight past that question, too. We had no answer on that or anything else.

To use the words of Dr. John Wells, an honest adviser to an honest man, the late John Smith:

"the Shadow Chancellor has been engaged in the truly astonishing feat of trying to present Labour as the Party of low taxation and public borrowing . . . it is breathtaking. For if a party of the centre-left has any simple guiding economic principle, it must surely be that it stands for a more active state than right wing—and for a bigger share of Government spending in national income".

That is surely right, which is why my right hon. Friends and I are in the Conservative party. We believe in a smaller state and in less Government spending. What anybody thinks that they would support that by backing the Labour party now is as much a mystery to Dr. Wells and me as it must be to the right hon. Members for Chesterfield and for Sparkbrook—an unlikely but formidable alliance.

One thing that I can say for sure is that, if this country were to find itself with a Labour Government elected on such a basis—having promised lower taxes and higher spending, with no theory or ideology of any kind to guide them, and no consistency or plan—it would find itself in a world where the soundbite would avail it of nothing. It is called the real world. Labour would be a broken-backed Government within six months, as they always have been before. Today's speech by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East was not in the real world. By contrast, my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget, like him, is honest, straightforward, robust, and well founded in a commonsense application of sensible principles. That is why Conservative Members wholeheartedly support it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I remind hon. Members that Madam Speaker has ruled that, from now on, Back-Bench speeches are restricted to 10 minutes.

7.12 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): I was interested to listen to the debate yesterday and today.

As some of my hon. Friends pointed out, council tax payers will bear the brunt of the so-called "1p reduction" in income tax. I am sure that many people will be alarmed at that proposal because they will fear for the services provided by local authorities. It has been suggested that extra money will be provided for education, although it has not been made clear whether that will be ring-fenced, so people in local authorities will be extremely worried about the Budget's impact on their jobs. It will threaten jobs, from teachers to cleaners. Even before the Budget, local authorities in some parts of the country, especially Coventry, had already started looking at jobs, pay and conditions. That did not bode well for lower-paid employees, or the education service and other services. So I imagine that many people in Coventry will be alarmed about this Budget.

The Budget did not do much for the unemployed, and I saw no reference to investment in young people. Rather, it contained punitive measures against young people as benefits will again be cut. Once again, young people are the whipping boy. One-parent families and old-age pensioners will also carry the brunt of this Budget.

Over a period of years, the Government encouraged many people, particularly young people, to take out mortgages. Unemployment now threatens their ability to pay those mortgages. Worse, the Government, who say that they support a property-owning democracy, have cut mortgage relief over the past two or three years. If one goes further down that road one notices a little thing called negative equity. The Government have hung a millstone round the necks of many young people who want to own their own homes, yet they call themselves the Government of hope.

Much has been made of the new initiative, which is actually an old initiative—it has certainly been around for a number of years—called "city challenge". I had always thought that the scheme was designed for the inner cities. The problem is that it is a lottery, so it will not tackle some of the major problems of the inner cities as the Government claim. On the contrary, leaders of city councils may have to wait 10 years before they see results using that method of pouring money back into our inner cities.

The Government have also made great play of the fact that, over the next two or three years, they will employ 5,000 extra policemen. When that figure is broken down, one sees that cities like Coventry will be lucky to have between 10 and 15 extra policemen. We need more than that to tackle some of the crimes committed in parts of the inner city that I could mention. Ministers have come to Coventry and insulted parts of that city and its population.

The Government propose to cut some £2 billion from the social security budget. Given that £3.5 billion has been cut over the past two or three years—the past two or three Budgets must be taken together—it means that £5 billion or £6 billion will have been taken from the social security budget.

The Conservatives claim to want to help the poor and say that they are the compassionate party, but over the past two or three years they have cut housing benefit, which does not help one-parent families, the poor or the homeless. One has only to talk to people who work for charities in any major city to find that, rather than assist organisations like Shelter, or the Cyrenians in Coventry, the Government have cut resources for staff which those organisations badly need. Those organisations not only house the homeless but deal with people with drugs problems. The Home Secretary said that he intends to set up a special task force to deal with drug abuse. If we leave out MI5, that task force must be funded, but there is no reference to it in the Budget.

The Budget does nothing for industry or to expand our industrial base. Conservative Members often talk about wealth creation, but when it comes to putting their money where their mouths are, they do nothing to help industry, which is crying out for help. It is no good simply tinkering with small measures like corporation tax. The Government must come to grips with the needs of industry, which include money for research and development, and for training. Where will future generations go to learn their skills? The Government have no proposals on that.

Except for a few hundred houses built while the Government have been in office, when was the last time that council house construction took place or cheaper housing was built for the less well-off? Instead, the Government have introduced a punitive Budget. That is the only way that it can be seen. It is not designed to help the needy, the unemployed, new home owners or local government. Rather, this Budget—I presume that next year's Budget will do the same—is all about tax cutting. That will benefit no one because the Government still owe the public £650 a year, or another 6p, which they robbed them of. They should not forget that yesterday's Budget did the public no big favours. They owed the public that cut in income tax because they ran the country into a £50 billion debt. The Government have the effrontery to tell the British people that they are doing them a favour with these tax cuts. They are not a favour, and the sooner the Government decide to go, the better for everybody.

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): For the record, I have declared in the Register my outside interests, although I do not think that anything I shall say will have a direct impact on them. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor on his wise, shrewd and balanced Budget. He is right not to take any risks with inflation or interest rates. The tax reductions have been shrewdly chosen and have many good targets, and I support the priorities of education, health and the police.

There is much that I should like to say, but in view of the time limit I shall confine myself to a few comments. I particularly draw attention to the measures for retirement incomes and the provision for long-term care. We all know the issues—demographic patterns and the fact that people living longer creates health problems in later life—and we all know about the high cost of community care. That may become one of the most potent political issues over the next 20 years.

The Chancellor has started to tackle the short-term problem of the feelings of many people who have saved throughout their lives only to see their savings eroded to meet the cost of community care in residential homes. The cost of that may also include the family home. Therefore, I warmly welcome the increase in the capital thresholds from £8,000 to £16,000 and from £3,000 to £10,000. That will bring relief to many people with modest savings. Many such people spoke to me while I was making speeches on that issue in various parts of the country.

The perception that the family home may have to be sold worries people. That does not always happen, but frequently it does and in due course I should like to see the family home exempted from the needs calculation for meeting the cost of retirement care. At least the Budget has introduced a good measure.

In the context of short-term issues, I welcome the reduction on savings incomes to 20 per cent. for basic rate taxpayers. It will affect mainly retired people because they are the people with building society deposits and a small amount of equities. The significance of that measure is shown by the actual cost in tax relief, which is £800 million. It is a significant measure that will help many retired people, but the long-term problem is much more formidable. It is essential to start to tackle the issue by encouraging many more families who can afford it to start saving through personal pensions and long-term insurance schemes—not just through TESSAs and PEPs—to meet the cost of retirement care.

At the moment, only 10,000 to 15,000 insurance schemes are being taken up but I have no doubt that in the next 20 years there will be a much greater need for such schemes. That means introducing tax relief measures to encourage people to save more. I am delighted that consultation documents are to be produced and that a couple of measures have already been suggested. A range of options is possible and I hope that over the year ahead we shall introduce them. An important actuarial point is that the earlier people start to save, the less they need to pay and the more benefits they will receive at the end of the day. Every year lost in encouraging people to take out policies for retirement care is a year lost for many families. Through tax measures and constant education, it is necessary to change the culture among the younger generation towards this issue, because it will have an impact on them. I am glad that the Budget took a step in that direction.

The second issue also relates to savings and I shall couple it with the Chancellor's remarks about the need for tax simplification. That does not just mean explaining tax measures to make them simpler for professional advisers and the public at large. We need to simplify the underlying structure of the system. In that respect, I should like to highlight capital gains tax. I welcome what has been done about inheritance tax and I hope that capital gains tax can be tackled next.

The right step on capital gains tax is not to abolish it altogether because there is a real issue in terms of the early years. The right approach is to taper capital gains so that the assets and the capital gains move quite swiftly, say within seven years, out of the tax system altogether. That is a much simpler way to deal with the issue than the current one and I hope that the problem can be tackled.

The third issue relates to the expenditure plans and it is the source of some disappointment. As a former Chief Secretary, I am fully aware of the difficulties that face any Government every year. I have been in several spending Departments and on the other side of the table, and I understand all the issues. I congratulate the Chief Secretary on his reductions in the overall expenditure plans this year, although part of the contribution is from the contingency reserve. I am sure that he will be very tough on that reserve in the year ahead.

I support the plans for education, health and the police and it would be churlish of me to single out the area in which I am critical of what has been done. Nevertheless I shall do so to highlight it for the years ahead; it relates to the roads programme. I strongly support the private finance initiative on roads and the concept of design, build, finance and operate. I started them and thought that they would be important in the years ahead. I hope that in due course motorway tolling can be linked to them to produce resources that will enable us to ensure a significant future roads programme. However, I do not think that the PFI and DBFO will be enough over the next three or four years.

A substantial number of road projects have been cut as a result of reductions in the programme. That worries me, partly because all over the country there is a need for more bypasses for environmental and other reasons, to relieve towns and villages that are hard pressed by traffic, but also because if we do not maintain a decent roads programme, congestion costs on businesses and the economy will start to grow again. Of course, a cut in the programme also has an impact on the construction industry.

Over the past 15 years a considerable number of bypasses have been built in my constituency and they have been of major benefit to all my constituents. There have been big improvements to the trunk roads in Norfolk, which were much needed for our economy. We have benefited substantially, but more bypasses are necessary and further improvements, by which I mean mainly widening of the main motorway and trunk road network throughout Britain are required. I hope that in future the Chancellor will look again at the impact of his measures on the profile of the roads programme to see whether more can be done.

My final comment flows from what the Chief Secretary said in the final part of his speech. In 1987 I was the first Chief Secretary to cost the Labour party programme and I remember the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) looking absolutely astonished at the scale of the programme to which his Front-Bench colleagues had committed him. Over the past few years we have been able to demonstrate clearly that Labour is the high-tax, high-spending, high-borrowing party. It has not changed and I was astonished by the effrontery of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). They have put together a number of tax increases and have clearly implied to the public at large that they will reduce them although, of course, we know that they will not. They attack quite a large number of increases in fares or charges—the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East did that in the debate—and imply that they would not have occurred under a Labour Government. All over the shop Labour is still committing itself to spending. The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) shakes his head, but I understand that within the past month 40 per cent. of all Opposition speeches have urged higher spending and that clearly shows what they will do.

Mr. Darling: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: No. I am almost finished.

Labour is trying to con the electorate into thinking that it would be a low-tax party as well because Labour Members know that that is politically attractive. However, when one examines the totality of their proposals, it is clear that that could not happen under a Labour Government. They would be back to high tax, high borrowing and high spending. On 10 November, the game was given away on "Clive Anderson Talks Back" by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who said that at present the Labour party did not want to cause trouble internally because it wanted to return to government, but that when "we come to power then you'll find the Labour Party is the same Party it's always been."

That is true. Therefore, the charge of the Labour party being a high-spending party—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Malcolm Bruce.

7.29 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Following the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), I support the principle of cutting the roads budget, although we think that the money should have been switched to public transport. I agree with him, however, that that cut should not be at the expense of long-overdue bypasses. It would have been extremely damaging if, as was suggested a little while ago, the Government had frozen all road projects that had not been started. I live in a part of the world where the population has grown by 50,000 in the past 10 years. A number of planned bypasses are just at the point where they should be started and I hope that they will not be further delayed.

I apologise to the Minister who will reply to the debate because, due to a previous engagement, I will not be here for his speech. No discourtesy is intended. No doubt he will take a free kick at the open goal.

This is a cautious Budget because it had to be. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows that the economy is so sluggish that the most important thing that it needs is a drop in interest rates. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury alluded to that and I understand that today the Confederation of British Industry called for a cut in interest rates. I hope that enough room has been created for that to happen. In my alternative Budget, I made it clear that getting interest rates down was the single most important economic priority.

The other problem and the reason why the Budget had to be cautious is that, although not quite in the terms that the Chief Secretary set out, to some degree, borrowing is out of control. If the Chancellor was not to cause alarm bells in the markets, he had to demonstrate that any changes that he was going to introduce were properly balanced and properly funded.

Having said that, there is a degree of dishonesty in the way in which the Budget has been constructed and presented. The most specific point is that the borrowing position does not justify the standard rate of income tax cut that has been driven by a political imperative that does not square with the Government's analysis last year. The Chief Secretary's predecessor, speaking in the Budget debate just one year ago—bearing it in mind that he was talking about a forecast public sector borrowing requirement deficit of £21 billion for the current year, which is £1 billion less than his successor is forecasting for next year—said:

"at those levels of borrowing, no prudent domestic or international observer of the British economy should have expected to see tax cuts . . . it is far more important . . . to be right than to be popular."—[Official Report, 30 November 1994; Vol. 250, c. 1237.]

That is obviously true until one gets to within 18 months of a general election, when clearly it is far more important to be popular than to be right. In the circumstances, inevitably the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been pulled in that direction.

The Chancellor's own wise men have given him some sort of shot across the bows. In the Financial Times today, Mr. Gavyn Davies of Goldman Sachs says:

"The target for the public sector borrowing requirement next year . . . is too high, and should not really have permitted sizeable tax cuts. Also, we have probably reached the point where spending plans have been cut so much they become implausible."

That is where the Chief Secretary's mettle will be tested. It is much easier to cut off the forecast figures than to deliver them at the end of the day. I am not saying that he will not achieve that, but the specifics of how it will be done have not been set out. In a pre-election year, when unpopularity faces the Ministers who preside over cuts, I predict that he will have difficulty delivering them. Consequently, his borrowing forecasts may yet turn out, as they did last year, to be more optimistic than he hopes.

Apart from that, the dishonesty involves the fact that on analysis the education commitment is nothing like as generous as the Chancellor sought to make it. The Chief Secretary stated that this was the commitment—from central Government sources, it appears that all that the Government are offering is funding for their pet schemes: the assisted places scheme and the nursery voucher scheme. All the rest of the funding must come out of the local government settlement.

The Chancellor wished to portray himself as a one-nation Tory keen to protect public services when in reality the best that he has done is hold the health budget just about to real health inflation. Although he has put some additional money into increasing the number of police officers, it is a phased introduction and £20 million is not a huge sum in the context of the Budget and it is against the background of cuts elsewhere in the Home Office budget.

Nevertheless, we welcome and will support some modest measures in the Budget. In particular—here I take up the comments of the right hon. Member for South Norfolk—the threshold adjustment and the help for the elderly who need long-term care are needed. Some imaginative new proposals, which again were alluded to, go in the right direction for encouraging people to make provision for themselves and for giving them an incentive to do so.

Not surprisingly, I welcome the 27p reduction in duty on spirits. The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not acknowledge that that was a reversal of the 26 per cent. increase that he introduced last year in a fit of pique after he was defeated on the VAT on fuel issue. Over time, whisky has consistently been our biggest export and home sales have suffered. I am not sure that the Chancellor was being that magnanimous because the indications I have are that his revenue fell as a result of the impact of the tax last year. I hope that he will stop there, listen to the Scotch Whisky Association and reduce duty on spirits so that it is more in line with the alcohol content and the gap is narrowed between beer and wine.

Overall, the Budget is something of a damp squib. For the reasons I have stated, the cut in the standard rate is not justified. We have consistently stated that we believe that education could be funded. We have said that, if necessary, we would increase taxation for it and we will vote against the 1p reduction in income tax and challenge others to support us in so doing.

The Budget's most alarming feature was the uprating of the Government's borrowing forecast. That took even independent commentators by surprise. We knew that it was bad, but not as bad as that. The Chancellor is forecasting that next year's borrowing deficit will be greater than his forecast for the outturn this year. This year's outturn is forecast to overshoot by £7.5 billion. The 1997-98 figure shows borrowing at £15 billion, which is three times the level forecast in last year's Budget. In the past 10 years, the average error in PSBR forecasts has been £11 billion per annum, so it is a big variation and not a firm foundation for definite decisions.

Frankly, the figures are awful and for the reasons that I have stated they could turn out worse. In addition, the wise men do not agree with the Chancellor's forecast that he can achieve 3 per cent. growth. They forecast 2.7 per cent. I hope that the Chancellor is right because clearly we want the economy to sustain higher levels of growth.

After 16 years in government, the Tories have not found the holy grail of sustained economic success. Some things are being done. Reform of the trade unions has been very much for the better and my party supported most of those proposals.

Mr. MacShane: It would, wouldn't it?

Mr. Bruce: Indeed it would because we believe in democracy, in industrial democracy in particular, and that the country has been dramatically improved as a result of those industrial relations reforms. I understand that the leader of the Labour party and Labour Front-Bench Members also support them, although they fought them all the way at the time.

The Government have also perhaps helped to deepen the understanding of certain fundamental economic realities such as that enterprises must ultimately make a return on capital if they are to survive. Having said that, the Red Book confirms that the post-war average growth rate of 2.5 per cent. is all that has been delivered under 16 years of Conservative rule. Although there are some important improvements in the underlying economic indicators, we have not yet got to the point where we can say that there is real confidence that permanently low inflation has been achieved.

When the Prime Minister says that inflation is in the box, he is being a little complacent, given the sluggish state of the economy, which is a major fact or in keeping it under control. As a result of that, the Government have not got to the point where we can say that we have stable and competitive interest rates. One of the reasons is that the Government insist on keeping interest rates under political control. All the indications are that that keeps them at a higher base rate than they would be if they were taken out of the immediate political arena, as we Liberal Democrats would wish.

Those may be some of the reasons why investment is low—and it is low, historically, across the board. Last year the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee was sceptical about Government claims that business investment would be 10.75 per cent. Sure enough, that figure was revised to 3.25 per cent—and the investment forecast for the whole economy was revised from 5.75 per cent. to 1 per cent. Although manufacturing investment is on the increase now, that is after a deep recession. As a percentage of GDP, it is still at an all-time low.

The Government are cutting their own capital spending as a means of helping to get their borrowing under control and trying to justify tax cuts. The private finance initiative has been launched many times, and was originally hailed as a way of boosting public capital spending. The hope was that it would unlock additional resources.

However, the Red Book shows that the forecast increase in the PFI is exactly offset by the forecast cut in the Government's contribution to capital expenditure, so the PFI is now directly substituting for what the Government would have done, and there is no net benefit in terms of the capital expenditure that might have been delivered.

The Chancellor and the Government talk about getting expenditure below 40 per cent. of GDP, but unless they are prepared to explain it, that is a meaningless figure plucked out of the air. If it is to be achieved by economic success, that means reducing unemployment and increasing earnings so that there is less call on the welfare budget, which is obviously the biggest single factor outside the Government's control.

If that is the plan, we need to know what policies the Government have, which they have not shown us over the past 16 years, to achieve that transformation. But to date they have totally failed to deliver. If there is no such magic new policy—there is certainly no evidence of one—the Government can mean only that they favour transferring more of the cost of health, welfare and public service provision to the consumers of those services. Presumably the provision to some of the most vulnerable people in our society will be reduced too—witness today's earlier benefits statement.

If that is what the Government are about, their argument may be perfectly honourable and justifiable, but it is not honest simply to call for public expenditure to be cut to 40 per cent. of GDP or below, without explaining how to achieve that. The Budget was a blatant attempt to sell a false prospectus.

First, the Government claim that there is room for justifiable and sustainable tax cuts, when patently there is not yet. They also claim that spending on health, education, and law and order has been increased. Health has been protected, but spending on law and order has been frozen and, unless the Chief Secretary to the Treasury can clarify the position for me, I shall continue to believe that real investment in education has, if anything, been barely maintained, and may still end up cut.

The Government claim to be providing a big funding boost for education, but they are doing nothing of the kind. That confidence trick involving education makes Liberal Democrats especially angry, because in our alternative Budget we made a commitment to a £2 billion boost as a minimum requirement for education—to deliver the nursery education that all parties claim to want, but for which only the Liberal Democrats are prepared to identify the funding, to reduce class sizes, and to provide more funding for books and materials, and better-quality further and higher education.

The Government claim that education will be boosted by £878 million. But the direct Government contribution will be enough only to finance their pet schemes, nursery vouchers and assisted places. All the rest is to come from the local authorities. The trouble is that this year's allocation to local authorities does no more than reverse last year's cuts. The Government are simply putting us back where we were a year ago.

Even working on the proposals for this year alone, the figures do not stand up. The Government say that there will be a 3.1 per cent. increase from last year's reduced total Government grant support to local authorities. Out of that, plus their council tax income, local authorities are expected to find an extra 4.5 per cent. for education. As education accounts for about half local authority spending, that means that 2.25 per cent. of the 3.1 per cent. increase should be earmarked for education.

It does not take a mathematical genius to work out that that leaves only 0.85 per cent. for all the other services—a real cut of almost 10 per cent. That means drastic cuts in local services such as community care, home helps and other essential local services. It also means that council tax will have to rise, and I gather that there is to be an announcement about that.

So the Government's proud boast of taking a penny off the standard rate of income tax has been made at the cost of a dramatic increase in council tax.

Mr. Waldegrave indicated dissent.

Mr. Bruce: The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is shaking his head. Perhaps he would care to tell me why in the Red Book the Government forecast an increase of £900 million in council tax income. That is clearly a sign that they intend to lift the caps, and that they expect local authorities to increase council tax to close the gap.

The Government hope that somehow or other they will gain the credit for cutting taxes, and still be able to claim that they have increased funding on education, while the local authorities will have to deliver the money and put local taxes up. That is dishonest; it is a sleight of hand—although it is probably typical of what one might expect.

Government spokesmen have acknowledged the fact that we Liberal Democrats have set out our priorities for the current year in our alternative Budget, which is more than can be said for the official Opposition. We have made clear our desire to have reduced interest rates and permanently low inflation—we agree with the Chancellor about the importance of that. We also stress the importance of bringing borrowing under control. I rather suspect that, because of the pressures that the Chancellor is under, we are now more concerned about that than he is.

We have set out our priority for an extra £2.5 billion for education, including £500 million to be spent on the fabric of our schools. We propose to take 750,000 people out of tax altogether, by introducing a 50 per cent. tax on earnings above £100,000. We would also harmonise the national insurance and tax thresholds. Disappointingly, the Government have left that area unreformed for a long time.

We would boost public transport, research and development, health, community care, overseas aid, child care and the spirits industry rather more than the Government have. We would also introduce specific measures to get the long-term unemployed back into work.

Those are costed, responsible priorities. What a contrast to the official Opposition. Both the other parties are off on the fantasy of trying to persuade voters that we can have higher spending, lower taxes, safe borrowing and a healthy economy.

The Labour party appears to have written its economic policy in Disneyland. It attacks the tax cuts on the ground that they are not enough, yet intends to abstain rather than support them. If Labour Members want tax cuts, why do they not have the guts to support them? If they do not want them, surely they should vote against them.

The Labour party explains nothing about how it proposes to cut tax, yet at the same time pledges more funding for education, health, transport and all kinds of welfare benefits. Labour says nothing about borrowing, inflation or interest rates. It wants to defy the laws of economics, and probably the law of gravity too. In its flirtation with Murdoch the Labour party should remember Icarus, who found that when someone flies too near the "Sun" he comes to earth with an almighty crash.

I believe that British voters are understandably disillusioned with politicians who make false promises that cannot be sustained because they never stood up in the first place. The Liberal Democrats' message is simple: "You know you get nothing for nothing. Good things have to be paid for. If tax cuts are to be sustainable, the economy has to have delivered the fruits of success. So if you vote for the economic policies of either Labour or the Tories you are doomed to disappointment. Liberal Democrats could make all the difference."

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has shot the fox of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who expected to be able to stand up and condemn him for a giveaway Budget and an attempt to bribe the electors in order to win the general election. Clearly the hon. Gentleman got it all wrong, because one would not get an enormous number of votes with tax cuts of £3.25 billion.

My right hon. and learned Friend has acted fiscally responsibly over tax cuts, because he has matched them pound for pound with spending cuts. That should please the markets, and it will give my right hon. and learned Friend a window of opportunity to cut interest rates in weeks rather than months.

That is vital if the Government are to achieve their target of 3 per cent. growth in 1995. Growth has slowed in recent months. The housing market is flat, the construction industry is in decline, retail business in the high street is weak, business confidence is dropping, and exports are slowing. So a boost to business confidence and consumer confidence is needed. By themselves, £3.25 billion-worth of tax cuts are not sufficient. They need to be accompanied by lower interest rates.

The Budget should not be judged in isolation. There will be another Budget before the election, and it is imperative that the Government continue to cut public expenditure so that they are in a position to make further tax cuts next year. With regard to specific tax changes, I strongly welcome all of them. They will be especially welcomed by the public who have had to bear three years of tax increases. I should like to mention one or two of those changes.

I am particularly pleased with the help to be given to businesses and small businesses. The marginal relief on business rates is to be welcomed, although we should look at the whole basis of the calculation of valuation of small shops for rent. At present, they are disadvantaged compared with large shops and supermarkets. The lower corporation tax is also welcome, but, above all, the abolition of inheritance tax on private businesses is long overdue. When the Opposition were in power—there is no doubt about it—many fine private family businesses had to be sold because of the old death duties.

As a third-generation wine merchant, I am delighted that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has cut whisky duties. I am also relieved that there have been no further duty increases on beer and wine. But the long-term problem of higher duties will have to be dealt with—I had hoped that this year the Chancellor might have made a start—because smuggling is increasing rapidly.

What worries me, with my experience of the industry, is that criminal elements are becoming involved. We all remember what happened during prohibition in the United states when the Mafia got involved in the drinks industry. The Mafia did not go away when prohibition ended. At some stage we shall have to deal with the problem. We cannot have an open market. Our own industry has been put at a disadvantage. We do not need to come down to the level of duties of the continentals, but we need to halve the difference. We could do that at one stroke if we put 1 per cent. on VAT. I do not expect my right hon. and learned Friend to do that. Nevertheless, the problem will not go away.

As a Member who represents a constituency where retirement is a major industry, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) and strongly welcome the changes with regard to the level of assets in old people's homes.

I turn to direct taxation, which is one of the most important aspects of the Budget. I do not think that it has got home to many people that we now have a basic 20p tax rate for all savings. On all savings—in building societies, banks and shares—people will pay only 20 per cent. tax. That is a great achievement. The widening of the band brings the day nearer when the majority of people will pay a 20 per cent. tax rate.

We have heard all about the so-called 10 per cent. rate that the Labour party is proposing. It is a confidence trick. I have been on a number of media shows—television and radio—in recent days with members of the Opposition. One member of the Opposition Front-Bench team said, when challenged about how much the rate would cost, "Ah, but it is only going to be a band." A band can be as little as £500 or £1,000, which would produce only a 10 per cent. tax saving. The proposal is a confidence trick, and it is dishonest.

There is complete chaos in the Labour party. I was also on television with the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who said that Labour should cut taxes at the low end and pay for them by increasing them at the upper end. I think that the right hon. Gentleman represents—probably—more members of the Labour party than the Leader of the Opposition.

I want to say a little about spending, because, in view of my long-expressed views, I am naturally disappointed that reductions in public spending were not greater. I am a little perturbed that the results of the very good work done by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on cutting departmental spending were completely absorbed by increases in the priority areas of education, health and the police. All the tax cuts were financed by reductions in the contingency fund.

However, it would be churlish to ignore the Chancellor's achievements, for this is the first time since Mr. Healey capitulated to the International Monetary Fund and cut spending over two years by 8 per cent. in real terms that general Government expenditure has been cut in real terms by 1 per cent. If that was the beginning of year-on-year reductions, I would be delighted. However, I find it disappointing that, after a 1 per cent. cut this year, the Red Book shows that, in the following two years, spending is set to rise again by half a per cent. each year.

The Government must give priority to reducing taxation. If one turns to page 88 of the Red Book, which shows tax revenue as a percentage of rises in gross domestic product, one sees the mountain that we have to climb to return to a lower tax regime. In the four years to 2000-01, tax as a proportion of GDP is projected to rise to 39 per cent.

We have to kill the doctrine of the inevitability of rising public expenditure. We need to change the culture in the public sector of "what matters is what we spend"; that things will be better if we spend another £1 billion on health or on education. We should concentrate on output, and what is achieved. When one considers how much we are putting into education, some of the recent reports on the standard of reading and spelling are very worrying.

We must judge a service on its output rather than its input. In the long term, we must take a long, hard look at spending on education and the national health service, as we are doing with the social security budget. There is no doubt that, although they are priority areas, they are very big organisations. I am sure that there is as much waste and over-management in those areas as there is in any other.

We still have a few sacred cows. In overseas aid, there have been no cuts in bilateral aid, and the Red Book says that we are the fifth largest donor in the world. We are also told that we are the 18th wealthiest country. Furthermore, some of the money donated is wasted. "The Cook Report" on television last night was very interesting, because it showed that £1 billion has been wasted in Albania.

I draw my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary's attention to the fact that he should look next year at Scotland, Wales and Ireland. We all know that expenditure in Scotland costs 30 per cent. more per head than in England. Expenditure in England is just over £2,000 a head, in Scotland it is £2,900 a head, and in Wales it is £2,365. Yet expenditure per head in Northern Ireland is more than £5,000 a head, which is set to be increased under existing plans by adding £130 million this year and £190 million next year to the budget. There should be a peace dividend from Northern Ireland—at least they are not blowing everybody up.

We have started on a long journey to bring taxes down eventually to below the level they were at the last election. That must go hand in hand with reducing spending as a proportion of GDP and progressively continuing to move, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor plans, to a balanced Budget.

We have no differences in our party on those aspirations. My right hon. and learned Friend and I agree. The only slight difference we have is the speed at which we travel. But it is vital that we make a major stride forward in next year's Budget and then set out our programme for the next five-year Parliament to bring taxation and spending down in the long term to or below 37.5 per cent. of GDP. I strongly support all the taxation measures in this Budget.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): We have just had a demonstration of what the Chancellor called "the slash-and-burn tendency". The remarks of the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) about Scotland and Wales, and especially about Northern Ireland, were clearly misjudged.

I regret that the Chief Secretary is not in his place, since I took what he said at the start of his speech as a serious confession. He said that he had attacked the Government in 1980 purely and simply to get a job with them. Of course, he eventually succeeded. It certainly told me a great deal about his inner strength.

The right hon. Gentleman is the Chief Secretary of a Government who have increased taxes over the past three years, after they made an election manifesto commitment not to increase taxes. Some measure of humility might have been in order. Although it might have been hard for someone from the Chief Secretary's class to make an apology to the country, he might have said with some humility that the Government were responsible for those tax increases. The nemesis of the Government will come sooner or later, but it will certainly come; and the Chief Secretary's nemesis may come even sooner.

The Chancellor realised early on that the British people would not be fooled by the tax cuts that his Back Benchers wanted. He knew full well that to come up with those tax cuts, even against the fiscal advice of his own Back Benchers, would have told on him, because the Government still have around their neck the fact that they have increased taxes by the equivalent of 7p on the basic rate. I know that they do not like us to repeat it, but that figure should be repeated again and again. Even after the Budget, with its certain level of tax cuts, a typical family will still be worse off by £670 per annum. That is the measure and the achievement of the Conservative Government.

Another reason—I hope, the most important reason—that the Chancellor took into account in his decision not to cut taxes further was the amount of debt that the Government owe. For years, the Labour party has had to withstand lectures from Conservative Members that it was not fiscally correct, could not run a Government, and could not handle the finances of a Government or run the country. When I think of black Wednesday and the state of the Government, I am not inclined—more importantly, the people of this country are not inclined—to listen to lectures from any Conservative Member, and especially from those on the Government Front Bench, with their record of running the country.

I do not see anything in the Budget to help industry in my constituency. The Hoover domestic appliance plant, which has an excellent export record, is in my constituency. I do not see any measures to help that company to operate and expand its market. The company and its work force have an excellent export record. I do not see any measures from the Government to help such companies. There is not much joy for my constituents in the Budget.

The hon. Member for Bridlington mentioned spending in Scotland. It is a fact of life that the Scottish Office, according to the expenditure plans announced yesterday, faces a sharp reduction in its annual budget over the next few years as a result of an overall cut in Government spending. Although the Secretary of State for Scotland—as a tactical move—chose to stress that the £173 million increase in cash terms in next year's total allocation was the highest ever, the fact is that the amount of money allotted pro rata to the Scottish Office has been reduced.

The Secretary of State has failed to fight his corner, and he has failed to fight Scotland's corner. The figures show that the Secretary of State for Scotland has had to accept a £320 million cut in real terms to next year's budget, and his Department faces cuts rising to 5 per cent. in the financial year 1998-99. The Secretary of State has failed to fight his corner against the Treasury.

I echo some of the comments made by a former Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), about cuts in the roads programme. I am a member and a supporter of the west coast main line group. I support rail services. I do not support motorway madness or roads for their own sake.

The fact of life is that the economic life of this country depends on an efficient road system for industry and commerce. Now we have a £4 billion brake on new routes because of cuts in that programme. That is purely and simply a short-sighted, short-term measure to respond to an immediate situation. The Government are putting off the evil day, because they think that we can do without the roads for another year or so, but damage will be done to haulage, freight companies and the economy as a whole because delays and traffic jams result in so much cost to the country. The Government's decision is short-sighted.

I know that the environmental lobby will argue, with some justification, about a reduction in road traffic. The Government have not mentioned the excellent report by the RAC, in which it suggests ideas which would cut car journeys by 20 per cent. I am in favour of cutting car journeys. It is ridiculous that an organisation such as the RAC, in a genuine attempt to tackle the problem of traffic, can come up with innovative ideas and methods that sometimes go against the interests of the car owner, when all that the Government can come up with is a £4 billion cut in the roads programme.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) is not in his place. He was in the Chamber for some time, waiting to speak. I am sorry that he is not here. I am sick to the teeth of the hypocrisy of the Liberal party, which preaches one thing in one area and something else in another. The hon. Gentleman said that his party was in favour of cutting the roads programme, yet the Liberals make a special case wherever it suits them to do so. In my constituency, the Liberals are campaigning against a project to complete a 12-mile motorway link. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's comments, but some motorway building is essential.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Does my hon. Friend think it a good idea that we should begin to consider reviving the coastal merchant fleet? It is the most environmentally acceptable method of transport and one that we should fight for. Places in Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom would benefit from shipbuilding. Coastal vessels could transport most of our goods around the coast without all the environmental problems that roads bring.

Mr. McAvoy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that brief intervention—I think. I look forward to intervening in his speech at some point, especially during a 10-minute limit on speeches. My hon. Friend's point is correct. We have under-utilised resources and methods of transport such as that mentioned by my hon. Friend. The Government's short-termism has failed to take account of that.

Of all the Budget measures announced by the Government, the one that describes the Government and their ethos best is the cuts in special benefits for lone parents and in housing benefit for the under-25s. That is a disgrace. The Chancellor claims to be a one-nation Tory. The nation will pay the price of treating its young people in that way, and the Government will certainly pay the price, too. Despite the Government's efforts to discourage that section of the population from registering, young people will fall over themselves to make sure that they are registered somewhere in time for the next general election. That will be their chance to seek revenge on the Government.

8.7 pm

Mr. Robert Hicks (South-East Cornwall): The Budget confirms that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor is determined to secure sustainable economic growth in a low-inflation environment. If, as a consequence of the measures announced yesterday, we can expect further reductions in interest rates sooner rather than later, that is to be welcomed.

Much has been written and spoken about tax rates. Given my right hon. and learned Friend's approach and his wish to help specific sectors of the economy and particular groups, he was right to limit the reduction in the standard rate to 1p. As the parliamentary representative for a low-income area, I have always argued that in a tight financial situation it is more important to increase personal allowances than to cut tax rates. I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's decision to increase personal allowances above the level of inflation.

I am pleased about a number of other measures, one of which specifically relates to the proposed assistance for people in residential and nursing homes. The existing financial arrangements are certainly too harsh in their application, and they undoubtedly penalise the thrifty and cause widespread anxieties among families. On public expenditure, I welcome the Chancellor's decision to make additional financial resources available in real terms for education, health and the police. There will be widespread public support for that decision.

The purpose of my speech is to make a number of comments about public expenditure as part of the unified Budget as it relates to the economy of the south-west, and Devon and Cornwall in particular. The House will know that, historically, the economy of Devon and Cornwall has been dependent upon primary activities such as agriculture, fishing, mining and quarrying, and later on tourism and defence.

The south-west is the most dependent of all the United Kingdom regions on defence and defence-related economic activity. The changes in the United Kingdom's defence requirements have led to the loss of some 21,000 defence-related jobs in the past 10 years, with further reductions of 20 per cent. forecast between now and the year 2001. The loss of income to the local economy through defence reductions is estimated to be in excess of £500 million.

Unemployment levels in Devon and Cornwall are traditionally higher than in both the official south-west region and the United Kingdom as a whole. Forty-eight per cent. of the travel-to-work areas in Devon and Cornwall feature in the worst 33 per cent. of the United Kingdom's unemployment black spots. Conversely, average earnings in the area are significantly below the United Kingdom national average. In my constituency, average earnings are 16 per cent. below the national average.

It is often said that our cost of living is lower. I wish that that were the case, but nothing could be further from the truth. The cost of living in my area is some 8 per cent. above the United Kingdom average, and this is compounded by the wide discrepancy in average council tax bills. For example, the average council tax bill in Cornwall last year was £447, which was 51 per cent. above the average in South Glamorgan. I would hardly consider Cornwall to be a spendthrift county, and it is more likely that this significant differential reflects a more favourable grant settlement for Wales than for England.

While I am not seeking on this occasion to question the overall level of public expenditure, I am seeking to influence Ministers to agree to a more equitable distribution that takes into account the genuine needs of the far south-west. It is only right that we in the far south-west do everything within our power to help ourselves, and this we will do. Indeed, the fact that we are helping ourselves will be evident from our tangible achievements in attracting foreign inward investment into Devon and Cornwall.

A total of £48 million of inward investment was gained last year, which resulted in the creation of 895 new jobs and the safeguarding of a further 550 existing jobs. The figures for the year beginning April 1995 are even more encouraging. Some £64 million in investment has been gained so far, leading to the creation of 1,237 new jobs and the safeguarding of 595 jobs. That is excellent news, and it is evidence that we are prepared to help ourselves. But just as the UK's industry, commerce and business in general seek a level playing field in their dealings with our European Union partners, so Devon and Cornwall require the same conditions in terms of the support we receive from the Government through public expenditure compared with the funds allocated to other parts of the United Kingdom.

I shall provide the House with two sets of figures to illustrate the existing unfairness. Last year, Devon and Cornwall received less than 1 per cent. of the national single regeneration budget, despite having almost 3 per cent. of the United Kingdom's unemployed people. Yorkshire and Humberside—with approximately the same percentage of unemployed people—received £19.2 million, or four times the allocation for Devon and Cornwall.

Secondly, taking Government aid and support as a whole, Devon and Cornwall last year received just £50 million in total, compared with £187 million for Wales and £530 million for Scotland. All these figures are taken from either the reports on the regional economy prepared by the Plymouth business school or the two independent reports prepared by Coopers and Lybrand. In addition, our regional daily newspaper, The Western Morning News, initiated in September a responsible and objective campaign for a better deal for the far south-west.

[Mr. Robert Hicks]

The Prime Minister and senior Ministers are aware of the findings of the independent reports, but there is increasing frustration and anger manifesting itself within the far south-west about the inability or unwillingness of the Government to respond to our genuine economic and social needs. When the Prime Minister received these reports 12 months ago, he said:

"We shall certainly take account of your points in allocating resources".

We are at that time in the political calendar when the decisions determining public expenditure allocations are made. I just hope that due consideration will be given this year to meeting the requirements of Devon and Cornwall.

8.17 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): The speech of the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Hicks) was very different from that of the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend). It was not just that the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall made a constituency speech, but that he referred to equitable distribution and how that related to the income tax provisions. Those points were entirely absent from the speech of the hon. Member for Bridlington, and I found myself at the opposite end of the political spectrum from every point made by the hon. Gentleman in his speech.

I wish that there was greater honesty from the Government in our Budget debates in the House. I realise that, in politics, that may be a wild wish, but we seem to have moved into a dangerous era of news management. We have had a Budget statement and debate in which some of the priorities have not been referred to at length. We have spent a lot of time debating the extra 50 per cent. on strong cider that will raise £5 million, and we have almost passed over what is happening with regard to VAT. Only one brief reference was made to that matter, although there are some proposals in the Budget which are aimed to raise £600 million by altering the accountancy schemes that operate in the collection of VAT. That is quite important. Will the scheme function? We are talking about a large amount of money.

News management does not merely take place when the Chancellor is addressing the television cameras in here. When we get to look at documents relevant to the Budget in the Vote Office, we find that some are press releases that are intended as news management. The Treasury argues that the average family will be about £450 a year better off and certain newspapers will pick up on that, but when one reads the qualifying remarks, one finds that it is talking about hoped-for economic growth, improvements in wages and other provisions and that that is what it is all about. Really, when one talks about the financial consequences of the Budget for an average family, if there is such a thing, one should consider the amount of money that will result from the Budget itself.

What was to be the Chancellor's final word on tax cuts? That was what everyone was concentrating on. We discover from the Red Book that, all told, income tax cuts account for about £3.7 billion. More than half that amount comes from the avenues that the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall mentioned and from alterations in the bands and allowances. That is interesting because, if we had had none of that, we could have had a tax cut of 2p in the pound instead, which was the headline that many people were looking for.

At least the cut in the Budget shows that the Chancellor is giving some consideration to other factors that need to be taken into account, although the Budget is generally entirely inadequate and inappropriate for our needs and does not do anything for investment and growth, as the Opposition Front-Bench team has said.

Where does that £3.7 billion come from? As I said in an earlier intervention, £3.2 billion is from the reserves. I do not want to over-egg the argument because there are some technical reasons why it is as much as that. Higher figures are given for reserves for the year ahead and the year ahead of that. As one moves into the fresh year, one always takes a certain amount of money out of the reserve, but it is a fact that, at the time of the autumn statement in November 1992, the contingency reserves stood at £4 billion and they are now down to £2.5 billion. Those reserves are gradually being raided and we may be in a precarious position if some of the other items contained within the Red Book do not function properly.

That is a serious consideration and it seems to have been recognised in a number of contributions tonight. People realise that that is where the money is coming from. If all of it has not come from raiding the reserves, at least a part of it—the tax cuts—has, and I do not think that that is a healthy position for us to be in, especially as some of the rest is expected to come from tackling social security fraud. Hon. Members have already expressed doubts as to whether it will be tackled to the extent indicated. So there seems to be something economically dodgy about balancing the amounts.

On the equity considerations, the arguments expressed by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), the Liberal Democrat spokesman, are important. We have been told that local authority expenditure on education will increase by something like 4.5 per cent., which is an increase in monetary terms. When we take into account inflation rates, it becomes an increase of about 1.25 per cent. The problem is that the latter figure is then tied in with the local government figure. We are told that local government expenditure will increase by 3.3 per cent.—just a little ahead of the inflation rate—so there will be no increased money for local government, although education has been granted that increase in expenditure. Cuts will therefore have to be made in other areas.

In one area—the fire brigade—equity runs in favour of Cornwall and not Derbyshire. The length of coastline is taken into account in the formula. Cornwall has a considerably longer coastline than Derbyshire, which is in the middle of the country and so has no coast at all. On grounds of equity, it seems that that arrangement should be altered.

It is little wonder that some money is being found for education, given the organisation, petitioning, lobbying and demonstrations with which parents, children and teachers have been involved. They have got some response. As always with this Government, however, when one gets a response in one area because of pressure, there have to be cuts in other areas—often areas of considerable need.

In Derbyshire, we have considerable problems in other areas, such as social service provision. I believe that tomorrow we will hear an important statement from the Secretary of State for the Environment, which concerns district councils and will be of vast importance to Derbyshire. The problem is not only the size of the total bill and whether it is being raided in areas other than education, but the massive problem of the avenues of distribution, which is of considerable importance in Derbyshire.

North-east Derbyshire has one of the worst-funded district councils in England per head of population. It is unbelievable when one considers the nature of the area. I know how it works because I know something of the nature of the formula that operates. It is a fiddled formula and happens to hit us from all directions.

We need a more open and honest Government, who will explain what they are up to and are not merely trying to manoeuvre and manipulate people when they produce Budgets. Greater expenditure is justified in many areas, such as overseas development. The peace dividend in Northern Ireland should be spent in Northern Ireland. Those are the sort of things that we should be able to get our teeth into in these Budget debates.

Sir Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): There is no question but that the Chancellor presented a highly responsible Budget yesterday in the face of a propaganda campaign conducted by the official Opposition in which they claimed that everything that the Government have done and said in the past six months was designed purely to provide massive sums of money for huge—and irresponsible—tax cuts. Yet again, they have been shown to be totally wrong. I hope, however, that the Chancellor will be able to follow it up in the very near future with a significant cut in the interest rate.

On education, we must be careful to recall that we are talking about expenditure in the next financial year. There is every prospect that, in that financial year—beginning April 1996—the inflation rate will not be in excess of 2.5 per cent. That means that the increase in expenditure on and money made available for education will be nearly double the rate of inflation. Local authorities will certainly be able to maintain services in their areas and, in many cases, they will be able to improve them.

In East Sussex, which covers my area of Brighton, the settlement exposes the hypocrisy of the campaign organised by the controlling political parties on East Sussex county council, which have been going around Brighton and the county saying that, within the next three financial years, there will have to be massive cuts in expenditure on education. They were talking about £24 million pounds. Such a cut was never going to happen and the new announcement of the money that is to be available has shot the campaign to pieces.

Unfortunately, many parents were seriously worried and upset by what I can only describe as a scandalous campaign. We now need a community campaign in East Sussex and Brighton conducted by parents, school governors and teachers to ensure that that additional money is spent in the county's education budget. Without one, I suspect that the county will find excuses for not doing so.

I want now to deal with pensioner issues. I warmly welcome the proposals on long-term care. They will give many families more financial security and greater peace of mind. The director general of Age Concern England, Sally Greengross, stated:

"Older people who are worried about paying for care will be delighted to hear the proposals in regard to the capital limits for residential and nursing home care."

That is indeed a major step forward, but it is just the first step.

The Government have said that they are preparing a consultative document on some of the problems of long-term care. I hope that that document will contain a range of proposals and possibilities so that there can be widespread consideration of the options. I hope that the document will include the possibility of people being able to buy equity in residential homes and/or to purchase a room in a residential home. That would help many people to preserve part, if not all, of the capital derived from the property that they owned and, when they died, the proceeds of selling their equity or room in the residential home could be passed down in the family.

There are two groups of pensioners that concern me deeply. There are those who do not claim income support when they could and those who have a few pounds a week above the income support level. Many of them will be worse off than people in receipt of income support. We have not yet found a way of giving the help and support that we should to those sections of retired people.

I am upset with one thing in the Budget—the Government's decision to cut the home energy efficiency scheme. Until the Budget, it was open to pensioners as a whole. Now, as I understand it, it will be limited to those on income support. That will create hardship and difficulties for those who do not claim income support when they could and for those who have only a few pounds a week above the level of income support. I submit to the Government Front Bench, with great respect, that that should be carefully reviewed. I hope that the decision will be reversed.

The payment of council tax on elderly relatives' annexes is another matter that has not been clarified by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor and it needs to be clarified as quickly as possible. A compromise might be that, if a flat can be sold separately, it should be liable for council tax, but if it cannot be sold separately, it should not be liable for council tax.

The Budget is a harbinger of good things to come. The country can be grateful that we have a Chancellor with great courage and integrity.

8.34 pm

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his statement yesterday, I took particular note of two sentences that he uttered early on. He said that he would seek "greater wealth and personal prosperity in which all can share" and that he would like to

"give the weak and the less fortunate a helping hand."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1055-56.]

I am afraid that, given the use of those terms, the Chancellor's statement was disappointing and, indeed, a miserable failure. He is not going to do anything of the sort.

[Mr. Bill Etherington]

Another illuminating point, which the plethora of media publications since the Chancellor's statement do not seem to have picked up on, was that the Chancellor mentioned that tax receipts last year were lower than expected. I was alarmed to hear that he is looking for more privatisation of public services and more private investment in public services. I think that the Government were the first to use the term "double whammy". That is a classic example of a double whammy because it can be guaranteed that the pursuit of those philosophies will mean that the public will have to pay more for services, not less.

I was intrigued by the Chancellor's section on transport and I praise his nice attitude on the treatment of veteran vehicles. I think that they are veteran vehicles when they are over 25 years old, but they might be vintage. Certainly people treasure such vehicles. If people do not have a vehicle on the road, they should not have to pay tax.

I was somewhat beguiled by the idea that one can somehow improve things by increasing the tax on fuel for road vehicles and the road fund tax—presumably to try to cut emissions, although the only way to do that is to reduce the number of miles that are run. At the same time, however, we are led to believe that there will be a considerable reduction in public expenditure on transport, especially public transport. Albeit on a small scale, there will be an increase in the cost of motoring. Many people have no choice but to use a vehicle—and they are not all well off—yet there is no credible alternative in the way of a well-integrated public transport system with proper investment. I found that strange. It is a short-term policy.

I had the dubious pleasure this morning of listening to the Secretary of State for Social Security on Radio 4 after the 7 am news. For once, he sounded uncharacteristically unconvincing when speaking about the Government's policies on single parents. The reason that he sounded unconvincing might be to his credit because he was, after all, trying to defend the indefensible. We should take the attitude of the Secretary of State in conjunction with the proposals on housing benefit. We are talking about two of the most vulnerable sections of society, but where is the helping hand for them? They are not getting the helping hand; they are getting the reverse.

Do the Government really believe, after years and years of under-investment in housing and the rise of private landlords brought about by their deregulation policies, that people on housing benefit are in a position to negotiate with their landlords to get a reduction in rent simply because the Government think that it is possible? Does anyone really believe that that is a credible proposition? My experience suggests the opposite.

Recently, one of my constituents was being threatened by her landlord. If she was not to be out on the street, she had to give him £10 a week in addition to the housing benefit that he received directly. He would not give her a rent book or a receipt. That is the sort of behaviour that is bred by the Government's present housing policy. I will say a little more about that later.

We are also led to believe that the reduction in tax on savings to 20p in the pound is a wonderful thing. What about investment income? We are told that the Chancellor wants to reward hard-working people, but I do not think that he rewards them by taxing what they earn at a higher rate than he taxes investment income. A millionaire who has invested £1 million can get away with paying tax at 20p in the pound, yet people on relatively moderate incomes must pay tax at a rate of 40p in the pound. That does not seem very satisfactory.

The Chancellor said that he believes that the Government can afford a 1p reduction in tax. That is notwithstanding the fact that the education budget has been cut consistently for many years. The council in my constituency is so strapped for cash that it has had to cut many education services and it is dreading—as I am—tomorrow's statement. It has also closed welfare rights agencies because of chronic underfunding through the Revenue support grant. I hope that, tomorrow, my local council, Sunderland city council, will be allocated the same amount of money as Westminster city council. That would solve all of my problems.

If the Chancellor can afford the 1p reduction in tax, which advantages those on high earnings disproportionately, why can he not afford to reduce value added tax on fuel? That would have given a helping hand to those in need, but there was nothing of that nature in the Budget.

I welcome the fact that tax on beer is not to be increased. I am fairly neutral on the subject of duty on whisky, but I am intrigued about why the duty on strong cider must be increased. If the tax increase is based on alcoholic content, why are spirits and wine—which are stronger than cider—not taxed in the same manner? I am still trying to work it out; it does not seem very logical.

On housing, I must declare an interest. I belong to the Durham Aged Mineworkers Homes Association, which comes under the auspices of the Charities Commission and is involved with the almshouse legislation. There will be 51,000 new social lettings this year, which is 9,000 fewer than the Government's lowest estimate. The cut from £1.5 billion to £1.1 billion will feed through into 18,000 fewer jobs next year—almost 10,000 fewer in the construction industry—and 30,000 fewer in the following year.

That will have a drastic effect in the northern region, where next year the number of homes that housing associations can start will fall from 3,097—which was the figure first promised—to only 1,670. That is a reduction of almost 50 per cent. Yet the Chancellor says that he is trying to do something about the housing sector. The only thing that he has done is introduce the spectre of more private landlords—and anyone who has studied history dreads that.

I believe that the Budget is based on economic failure. The hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Sir A. Bowden) described it as a prudent Budget which was not quite what was expected. I agree that it is a prudent Budget in some respects, but it does not address any of the problems that I face in my constituency. It will not alter society for the better—indeed, I believe that it will have the opposite effect.

Much has been said about the Labour party's position on the 1p reduction in income tax and whether we will vote against it. I do not pretend to speak for the party; I just try to speak honestly for myself. One has to be prudent, but I must admit that I shall find it very difficult to resist voting against the 1p decrease because I think that it is regressive and to be deplored.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): At the outset, I declare my interests as they appear in the Register of Members' Interests—although I do not think that they will be very relevant to my speech tonight.

It is a great pleasure to support a very cautious and prudent Budget. The last few Budgets were necessary, but I cannot say that they were altogether pleasant. It is never pleasant to be forced to raise taxes but, coming out of a recession, it was necessary. For a party that is always strongly committed to reducing the tax burden, it was an unfortunate necessity.

The medicine has worked, however, and the economy is now doing extremely well. Our inflation rate is low—historically, it is at a very low level—and there are very few signs of inflationary pressures in the economy. Unemployment is decreasing, and it has been doing so consistently for a long time. Even the public sector borrowing requirement is decreasing fast—it decreased by £7 billion last year. The only problem is that it is not decreasing as fast as was projected originally and we are contemplating being one year behind the initial predictions.

Nevertheless, growth in the economy has been good. Last year, at 4 per cent., economic growth was too good as such a level is unsustainable in our economy. This year, the growth rate has reduced to a very healthy 2.75 per cent. That is still well above the economy's trend rate, which is some 2.25 per cent. With a rise expected next year, I think that we can be content that economic growth is very strong and not leading to inflation.

We are seeing signs of long-term, sustainable growth and that means that the supply side reforms for which the Government fought over 16 years are at last having an effect. All of that good news led my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor to produce a cautious Budget in which he did fundamentally very little. Although the economy is doing well, the recovery is still patchy.

The outlook is favourable for exporters, but two sectors of the domestic market—the retail sector and the housing market—are not doing well. I believe that it is correct to put money back into the pockets of individuals who can then spend it as they wish. That boosts retail sales directly and the building and housing markets indirectly. Tax cuts are the most effective way of putting money back into people's pockets and, as such, are entirely justified. They are a very sensible way of helping two sectors of the economy that have been in serious trouble.

However, I do not believe that tax cuts by themselves are enough. We now need substantial cuts in interest rates. Such cuts will not do very much for industry directly—after all, interest rates are at historically low levels and industrial investment decisions are unlikely to be influenced by further reductions in interest rates—but investment decisions are likely to be influenced by demand in the economy for the goods that industry can provide.

I do not believe that interest rate cuts will assist the housing market. House prices are now very low and houses are extremely affordable in income terms. Interest rate cuts will put more money back into people's pockets. They will have the same effect as tax cuts to—increase demand and, in turn, increase investment in industry. They will also increase people's willingness to spend money on their houses.

I should like base rates to be cut by 0.5 per cent. before Christmas, followed by another 0.5 per cent. cut fairly soon after that. I believe that a 1 per cent. cut in interest rates is entirely sustainable and I do not believe that it would adversely affect our exchange rate—particularly as German interest rates are now on a downward trend.

I must, however, mention one or two matters about which I am less happy. The first is the uniform business rate and its effect on London. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget statement that, in parts of the country where rateable values are increasing, the uniform business rate is to be phased in more slowly than originally intended. In London, we suffer from the reverse problem. When the uniform business rate was introduced in 1988, property prices were extremely high. The revaluation that followed was done when property prices in London had come off the peak, and many businesses found that the notional reduction in their uniform business rate was phased in very slowly.

There should be a better balance between the phasing in of increases in parts of the country that are suffering them and the phasing in of decreases in London. Business in London, especially retail business, is in very poor shape at the moment and would benefit enormously from a reduction in rates.

My final argument is more technical. The Budget will lead inevitably to a very complex Finance Bill. There are technical changes in the tax structure that will be hard to put into a short and easily understood Finance Bill. As a veteran of many Finance Bills, and having sat on many Finance Bill Committees, I know the problems that confront the Committee when it has to examine highly technical clauses. There is neither the time to examine them in the detail needed nor, occasionally, the expertise in the Committee necessary to give them the scrutiny they deserve.

That problem should be tackled and there are several ways in which it might be done. The most obvious way, as several of us have suggested for some time, is to separate the technical taxes management aspects from the tax changes and put them into a separate Bill, which might be examined by a Committee that had the time to examine them thoroughly.

Alternatively, expert evidence might be taken on the highly technical clauses. That might be done by a Standing Committee with a dispensation of the House, or the Bill might be passed initially to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee to pre-vet those clauses, take evidence if required and produce a report for the Finance Bill Committee to consider.

One thing is certain. The technical clauses in the Finance Bill do not receive the scrutiny that they deserve. We end up returning to them year after year to change what we have passed in the previous years, which is highly unsatisfactory.

The Budget has done what is needed in the economy. I believe that it gives us that wonderful goal that we have searched for for years—sustainable, low-inflation growth. I hope, therefore, that it will lead to greater things in the Budget next year.

8.52 pm

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): I joined the Labour party about a quarter of a century ago, and I remember that the first great disappointment of my youthful membership was the introduction of a Budget by one Roy Jenkins, now a Member of another House, which led straight to Labour's defeat in 1970.

From a political point of view, the Budget presented yesterday by the Chancellor smacks very much of the same Treasury orthodoxy—cautious, candle-ends, steady-as-she-goes manipulation of the nation's finances, which, although the orthodox economists at the Treasury may smile about the fact that they have mastered their man, may lead to considerable political dismay in the Conservative party. We were aware of that yesterday, when the only cheer or smile came when the Chancellor announced that he would lift the vehicle tax on Bentleys and Bugattis. For the rest, it was a poor and dull reception indeed.

As we are discussing Mr. Jenkins and one of his successors, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), let me turn to another Conservative philosopher, who once said:

"The whole business of the poor is to administer to the idleness, folly and luxury of the rich, and that of the rich, in return, is to find the best methods of increasing the burdens of the poor."

The Paymaster General, a learned graduate of Oxford university—I wish to apologise to him and to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) for the fact that I must leave before the winding-up speeches—will recognise that quotation from Edmund Burke. Would that we had a Burke here today, to flay the creation of a two or even three-nation society, which the Budget will only exacerbate.

Twenty-one new taxes have been imposed since 1992, every one bearing mainly on the poorer members of the community. We are told that the Chancellor's decisions since 1992, reinforced by the Budget, will help to steer the British economy on to a more stable course, yet we are 18th in the world gross domestic product per capita league, having slipped from 13th since 1979.

Inflation here is higher than in the majority of European Union countries, including our main competitor partners. In its latest quarterly report, the Bank of England condemns the decrease in productivity improvements, especially the increase in unit wage costs, and we have the lowest investment witnessed for about 30 years.

That bears down especially hard on my constituents, because I have to see the Budget refracted through the eyes of the people of Rotherham, and not many live in £200,000 houses there. Not many have handsome investment incomes from savings who will benefit from the tax cuts that the Chancellor has made. On the other hand, 12.5 per cent. of the working population are unemployed—12,000 people altogether. One in five people under the age of 25 in Rotherham are out of work, and are now under a new onslaught as the money is taken from them to put into the pockets of the rich.

Is there any hope from the Budget for my constituents? It is a Budget that slashes a dagger at the arteries of investment, with £100 million taken away in grants to housing associations. That means that 35,000 fewer houses will be built this year as a result of those costs, and the construction workers and the small building firms of Rotherham will be left to face bankruptcy and despair. There are cuts of £190 million in the roads programme—another blow for domestic construction and the civil engineering programme.

The business men of Rotherham and South Yorkshire wrote to the Chancellor last week. They begged him for any tax breaks in the Budget to be targeted at industry through increased capital allowances: no hope there. They welcome the private finance initiative, but find nothing in it for South Yorkshire, especially as those business men say that red tape defeats any efforts that they make to try to get the private finance initiative to work.

There is something very strange in the Red Book—a massive discrepancy, not only in the public sector borrowing requirement, but in other sectors, between what we were told last year and what actually happened. The Chancellor collected £1.1 billion less than he forecast last year in income tax, £700 million less in corporation tax than predicted last year and £1.5 billion less in value added tax than he predicted last year. There is an odd contradiction between the mood music that we constantly hear at DTI and Treasury Question Time about the economy getting stronger—indeed, the Prime Minister said in Prime Minister's questions on Tuesday that incomes were rising—and the fact that we are collecting less and less tax.

One reason may be the fact that tax avoidance remains one of the great growth industries in the British economy. As the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) suggested, tax legislation is the most complex legislation that the House passes. In fact, we have much the most complicated tax legislation in the world. Last year Rupert Murdoch made a profit of £960 million, but paid only £11 million in tax. What is the Chancellor's response to the fact that £15 billion to £17 billion has been lost in uncollected tax? His response is to fire 6,000 Inland Revenue employees who might be usefully employed gaining money for the state to help to balance the books.

Then we move on to the nightmare of self-assessment. Here I address my remarks to Front-Bench spokesmen of my own party. I do not know how many hon. Members have examined the nine new complicated forms that taxpayers will be expected to fill in under the proposed new self-assessment scheme, which will cover some 9 million taxpayers, but even at the height of the Soviet bureaucracy, the Soviet citizen was never plagued with a requirement to fill in such complicated forms. The Budget does not address the question of what we mean by and want from taxation; it contains neither innovation nor inspiration.

I welcomed the ideas presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor, in the run-up to the Budget. He recommended a windfall tax—an appropriate suggestion, given the profits declared today by Yorkshire Water—and taking swathes of people at the bottom of the income scale out of the tax band with his 10p proposal. Here was the beginning of serious, innovative thought about our outdated tax regime. After all, the taxation of our people implies a fundamental relationship with Government.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury made much of his conservatism. He has been a Fellow of All Souls for many years; I must add that in recent months he has helped to turn his party into a lost cause. He will recall the words of his old mentor Disraeli, who said of conservatism:

"It offers no redress for the present, and makes no preparation for the future."

For my constituents in Rotherham, who live in the "two nations" Britain that the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary have created—people who cry out for redress of present ills and investment in future growth—the only answer is a change of Government.

9.1 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) has said, I wish to defend the Inland Revenue's record on self-assessment. I believe that it will lead to simplification. It simply is not true to say that every taxpayer will have to fill in nine forms; the average taxpayer will have to fill in the main form and one schedule. I have just received the latest pack of self-assessment forms from the Inland Revenue. The Revenue has simplified the system considerably following consultation, and I think that it has done a pretty good job. In the long run taxpayers should save money, and we should be able to ensure that revenue is collected with fewer staff.

Listening to the speech of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), I wondered whether he had actually read the Red Book. I suspect that he had not. He complained a great deal about the level of investment, but if he had looked at page 30 he would have seen that manufacturing investment is forecast to increase by more than 10 per cent. this year and in 1996.

Similarly, I wonder whether the hon. Member for Rotherham took the trouble to read the Red Book. He, too, complained about the Government's record on investment. On the same page, the Red Book tells us that business investment is forecast to increase by 9 per cent. in 1996. I should have thought that that was a pretty good record.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East also complained about the present state of the labour market. If he had turned to page 39 of the Red Book, he would have discovered that the employer survey measure of the labour market shows an increase of 510,000 jobs since the trough at the end of 1992. The labour force survey shows an even higher figure of 650,000 over the same period. That is a pretty good record. It contrasts sharply with what happened during the recovery after the last recession, when employment did not stop falling for about four years following the trough of the recession. It illustrates the current flexibility in the labour market, which now responds much more quickly to changes in demand.

I do not know whether you saw the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on "Newsnight" last night, Madam Deputy Speaker. Jeremy Paxman rightly pressed him on why the Opposition refuse to make up their mind about whether they are in favour of reducing the standard rate of income tax by 1p in the pound. Labour Members are going to abstain: they are neither for nor against the proposal. I was interested to observe that the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) clearly feels pretty uncomfortable about that. His feeling is understandable. The position of the Liberal Democrats is at least honest and straightforward: they will vote against it. What do Opposition Front Benchers think about it? Are they for or against it? How can they possibly abstain? It was no surprise to me that the hon. Member for Oxford, East looked so uncomfortable on the television last night.

This is a responsible, prudent and sensible Budget. I particularly welcome the fact that public spending as a proportion of gross domestic product will soon fall below 40 per cent. There is always an interesting table in the Red Book. This year, it appears on page 139, and it shows the record of public spending over the past 30 years. It shows that, in the recession of the middle 1970s, public spending peaked at about 47 per cent. of GDP. In the recession of the early 1980s, it peaked at around 45 per cent. and in the most recent recession it peaked at around 43 per cent. We have been moving in the right direction over the past 20 years, but we should aim, once we have it below 40 per cent. of GDP, to keep it there.

The Governor of Hong Kong, Chris Patten, was quite right—he has learnt a little from his time in the far east—to say that there is a correlation between the proportion of public spending as a proportion of national income and economic growth rates. Countries in the far east spend a lower proportion of their GDP and have higher growth rates. That is a good target. We are making good progress towards achieving it and we should stick with it.

What has led to a higher public sector borrowing requirement for the current year and for next year is not the Government's failure to control public spending, which has been kept under effective control, but rather, as the hon. Member for Rotherham said, that revenues have not come in at the anticipated level. In particular, VAT revenues are down by about £4 billion from the amount forecast, and next year's VAT forecast is lower than that for this year. That may be because of a lower level of consumer spending than was forecast. It is hard to know precisely what has contributed to that. It may not be so much VAT as the duties on alcohol and spirits, because a great deal of alcohol is now imported from France. That may have something to do with it, but revenues are down, and that is the explanation.

It is important that we ensure that public sector borrowing continues on a downward path, which is precisely what my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor proposes. It will soon be below the Maastricht level of 3 per cent. Significantly, I noticed that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary referred in his speech to capital expenditure, which is running at around £22.5 billion. That is quite a useful yardstick, too. The Government should not borrow more than the amount of capital spending in any particular year. It looks as though the two will coincide next year.

The Budget has also been criticised for not doing anything about investment. The Opposition came up with the tried but failed formula of increasing capital allowances. That did not work last time and it will not work if they ever have the chance to do that again, because it distorts capital spending decisions. What matters much more for investment is a stable economic climate, which is precisely what we have—low interest rates and low inflation.

The PFI has been criticised on the ground that there are not enough schemes to illustrate precisely what can be achieved. I should like to mention two, both of which will benefit my constituency. The first is a massive extension to Wycombe General hospital, which will cost £32 million. The project was proposed by South Buckinghamshire NHS trust and is financed by the Royal Bank of Scotland. I understand that the developer will be Taylor Woodrow. That is a hard and fast example of a project that will benefit NHS patients in my constituency.

[Mr. Tim Smith]

Another good example is the widening of the M40 from three to four lanes between Denham and High Wycombe. It is going ahead under a design, build, finance and operate contract. I hope very much that it will start in the middle of next year. It probably could not have been achieved without the PFI. Those two schemes will go ahead in the next 12 months.

Like my hon. Friends, I welcome the fact that education spending is to be increased. The key is to ensure that the £878 million that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment announced finds its way to the schools. I know that it is difficult to ring-fence this money, but we need some examples of how much each school would benefit if its budget were to be increased by 4.5 per cent.

I welcome the fact that the police are to get extra resources, and I understand that an announcement will be made tomorrow. I hope that Thames Valley police will get their share of the additional resources.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor made a welcome announcement about simpler legislation for Inland Revenue taxes. I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) said. It will provide the Procedure Committee with an opportunity to consider how we will deal with the additional legislation. My right hon. and learned Friend has proposed that all Inland Revenue taxes should be rewritten over a five-year period. I think that we should reconsider the idea of dividing up Finance Bills between the main taxation elements and the more technical elements.

The Budget is prudent and sensible and it will benefit consumers, taxpayers and the British economy alike.

9.11 pm

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) talked about the 500,000 jobs that have been created since the trough of the recession. He compared that with the last recession. Whose recession was that? That was also the Tory party's recession. If one picks the starting date and the finishing date carefully for statistics, one can prove almost anything.

Not long after the Government took office they created a solid bottom level of unemployment of at least 2 million people out of work. There is now a wasted generation. The real tragedy is youth unemployment and the Budget does absolutely nothing to deal with that problem. Nationally, 650,000 people under the age of 25 are out of work. In the west midlands region alone, 66,000 people are out of work, and in the metropolitan area the number is over 24,000. In some inner-city estates, it is unusual for a young male to have a job. That has been the case for over 10 years since the first Tory recession that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield mentioned. In my opinion, the Budget did very little that will affect that situation.

The Chancellor usually gives the Budget a name, such as the Budget for jobs, the Budget for Britain and the Budget for investment. He did not seem to give a name to the Budget this time. We thought he might call it the Budget for the Tory party's survival, but according to the reaction of Tory Back Benchers it was not that. It must be the no-name Budget. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not give it a name himself, we will. The Queen's Speech was the "smoking out the Opposition Queen's Speech" and the best we can do for the Budget is probably The Sun offering of the "cold kipper" Budget.

The Chancellor is trying to say that it is a prudent Budget, but is it? He has slashed some capital spending, and that is hardly prudent because it only builds up problems for the future.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: For information, we toyed with the idea of calling it a Budget for lasting prosperity, but the Opposition have given soundbites a bad name so I decided to drop the tradition.

Mr. Ainsworth: The Chancellor would not have got away with "the Budget for lasting prosperity". The headlines would have called him into even more ridicule had he tried to hang that title on his offering.

The Chancellor slashed capital spending. That is irresponsible because it puts off problems until tomorrow. That is exactly what the Government are doing. They plan to cut capital spending on the NHS by 26.5 per cent. over the next five years.

Over time, the party of prudence has incurred a huge increase in debt. Government spokesmen have compared the debts of some Labour-run cities with those of third-world countries and derided them by saying that Birmingham or Coventry, for example, owe more than such and such a place. But the Red Book shows that this country pays £22 billion a year in debt interest, which is more than we spend on defence or law and order and three times what we spend on transport. It is incredible that the Conservative party tries to pretend that it is a party of prudence when it has inflicted pain on people while running up such debts. It is clearly not the party of prudence, as the Chancellor would have us believe.

The increase in petrol prices coupled with the increase in vehicle excise duty are the two measures in the Budget that are causing the most anger in the country. I understand the need to discourage the excessive use of cars, but if petrol prices and vehicle excise duty are to be increased well above the rate of inflation, poor motorists will be punished. The Government have decided to settle traffic and tax problems by driving poor motorists off the road. That simply cannot justified. We should try, over time, to move the burden of taxation from excise duty on to petrol duty so that people pay tax for using their cars, not for having access to a car. In some rural and inner-city areas, people want a car to make themselves economically viable and get themselves into the job market, yet the costs of insurance and vehicle excise duty do not allow them to become car owners.

Conservative Members hold up our car industry as an example of some kind of revival, but all that we have had is inward investment. Nowadays, our car industry, apart from small companies, is completely and absolutely owned by foreign companies. We should not boast about that. I do not knock inward investment as our country needs it badly for the jobs that it brings. But the United Kingdom, Spain and Portugal have had the inward investment in the car industry. Is that the league that we want to put our country into? We boast about inward investment by Samsung in another industry, but the two countries that Samsung has invested in are the United Kingdom and Slovakia. Is that the league that we want to be in?

I agree that we need investment from wherever it comes but, as Conservative Members know, the problem that we have had for a long time is that our indigenous companies have not invested at the rate that they should. To see how that problem developed, we must look at the decline that has taken place throughout this Government's term, back through the previous Labour Government's term to the 1960s. People think that it is a natural decline and that the number of jobs provided by the car industry will inevitably fall. Jaguar, which is in my constituency, is a relative success but, over a period, it has failed to increase the number of jobs that it provides. In 1959, it employed about 5,000 people; it now employs 6,500. Over the same period, BMW has grown from 6,000 employees to 75,000 and it has now bought out the Rover group with another 30,000 employees.

A couple of years ago, Conservative Members derided the German economy and its way of doing business. They said that we would overtake Germany and become the leading economy in Europe, and that we could not have social contracts and works councils because they would ruin the economy. However, those are exactly what have applied in Germany over that 30-year period. That is exactly what applied in BMW over those 30 years. The BMW works council played a significant role in the development of job opportunities and job creation over a long period, and the result has been a tenfold growth in the number of jobs.

We ought to see some investment and some work that helps the car industry, but as in so many other areas what we get is pretence. A short time ago the Department of Trade and Industry issued a press release about the work that is being done along with the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders in trying to assist the small businesses that form the supply sector of the car industry. Everybody knows that the growth in jobs will be in that sector and not in the front-line companies and that there will be a need for quality research.

When we look behind the boast about the work that is being done with the SMMT, we see that about 200 companies will be involved and that 12 experts in quality have been taken to Japan for quality training so that they can help those 200 supplier companies. There are 4,000 supplier companies in the car industry and the problem is that our suppliers need a huge improvement in quality to compete on the world market. We are playing games and pretending to deal with those problems.

The country needs a Government who are actively involved in tackling these problems and not a Government who are happy to see a constant 2 million people unemployed—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. [Interruption.] I am sorry, but the 10-minute rule is strictly enforced.

9.21 pm

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): Unlike the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) I entirely welcome the Budget. The problem with hon. Members such as him is that they often attempt to rewrite history. The hon. Gentleman spoke about problems in the car industry in the west midlands and about the growth of BMW, and he compared the number of employees. But he entirely forgot to mention all the trade union militancy that was supported by so many Opposition Members when I lived and worked in the west midlands throughout the bad old days of the last Labour Government. Opposition Members should remember that it was trade union militancy and Labour apologists when that party was in government who completely wrecked the British car industry.

I want to speak about the reaction of ordinary people to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor's excellent Budget, and I shall start by quoting a clothing and footwear assistant who told the Financial Times that the Chancellor had listened to the small people and thought that it was brilliant news. Those who are responsible for creating jobs in Britain are the people in the CBI. Its director general welcomed the fact that the Government had broadly stuck to the prudent economic line that the CBI recommended. He said the CBI was pleased that the Chancellor appeared to have limited tax cuts to reductions in spending and that he had resisted the temptation to go for excessive tax cuts. That is the kind of welcome that I like to hear.

On BBC 2 a Mr. Len Stone said:

"My job will be secure. The Budget is good for industry, steady growth and people will buy more vans, especially the contract fleet."

The Financial Times stated that the financial markets had to be convinced that the needed combination of tough spending control and economic growth would be delivered, provided that the Chancellor convinced them that he would be able to cut interest rates. I hope that the Financial Times is right about that because that too will help my constituents.

I am particularly pleased that my right hon. and learned Friend listened to submissions by me and by many of my hon. Friends about help for the elderly and especially for those who require now, or may require, long-term care. My constituency has the highest proportion of pensioners of any constituency and I was particularly pleased not only at the measures in the Budget but at the way in which they have been received. In particular, Sally Greengross, director general of Age Concern, is quoted in The Daily Telegraph as saying:

"Older people who are worried about paying for care will be delighted".

Jill Pitkeathley of the Carers National Association said:

"We are delighted that this will relieve the worries of many families".

It is rare that I quote with approval anything said by a general secretary-elect of Unison, but even Mr. Rodney Bickerstaffe was heard to say on BBC Radio 4:

"Anything that's going to help the elderly is going to be useful. It's a step in the right direction. So far as the poorest earners are concerned, there is something for them".

Even if Opposition Members do not recognise it, the country recognises that the Budget has been prudent, sensible and helpful.

I was especially pleased that my right hon. and learned Friend dealt with the difficulty that existed in relation to employee share ownership schemes. As one who, for a long time before coming to the House, supported employee share ownership, the sharing of companies' successes and the involvement of employees in those successes, I was delighted that Gill Nott, chief executive of Proshare, said about my right hon. and learned Friend's measures:

"This is the best Budget for employee share ownership that we have seen in many years".

[Mr. Nick Hawkins]

On public opinion, a Mr. Steve Spurling, a bank employee from Crawley, was quoted on BBC Radio 4 as saying about the Budget:

"I'm personally pleased with the overall package introduced covering a range of areas. It means to me about £20 a month which is a tangible sum, something I can actually get my hands on".

I am especially concerned to ensure that there should be further help for the construction industry and I declare my interest as a consultant to the Building Employers Confederation. In that regard, there has been a broad welcome to the expansion of the private finance initiative. Sir John Banham, chairman of Tarmac, is quoted in the Independent as saying:

"The Chancellor is on the right track and the measures he has put in place provide the best prospects for the UK building industry".

In relation to the housing market, the chief executive of the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors is quoted in the Independent as saying:

"On the housing market, we are pleased that there has been no attempt at a quick fix. We have argued for some time that special help for housing will not work because the problem is not one of affordability but of confidence".

I agree with that and I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget measures will bring back that confidence.

The chairman of Siebe, Mr. Barrie Stephens, is quoted in the Financial Times as saying:

"I am very enthusiastic. The Government has looked at the economy dispassionately and sensibly and showed that they are good managers. It is a prudent and balanced Budget."

I especially welcome the fact that three steps have been taken towards a 20p basic rate in income tax, which helps both the lower-paid and savers. It is crucial that the Government's economic strategy should benefit the thrifty, especially thrifty pensioners. Income tax cuts that my right hon. and learned Friend has introduced will benefit 26 million people. Now one quarter of all taxpayers pay tax at only 20p.

I am delighted that my right hon. and learned Friend has cracked down on fraud and waste, and that he has helped to provide more provision for schools, for law and order and for health, the same three priorities that I and many of my right hon. and hon. Friends had urged on him.

By contrast, Labour's sums do not add up. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) had five questions from myself and other hon. Members. He failed to answer a single one in his speech. He cannot answer them because his sums do not add up. Labour cannot oppose the 24p basic rate because it knows that that rate is popular. Its policies are as bankrupt as it would seek to make the country if it were ever unfortunate enough to be in power.

I welcome the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend has not sought to hit the UK insurance industry. We wish to encourage more people to have proper insurance cover. He has rightly recognised the strength and importance of the UK insurance industry and not increased insurance premium tax. The problem with Opposition Front-Bench Members is that they all have backgrounds not in business but in lecturing and legal work. They do not understand the needs of the British people or the British economy. Only my right hon. and learned Friend and his right hon. and hon. Friends have that ability and I strongly support his Budget.

9.29 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): I thought that the Chancellor had a legal background, as indeed do I. I was interested in what the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) said in praise of the Budget. If he is so confident about the Government's position, one wonders why he is, as I understand, on the lookout for a safer seat, and is joining many of his colleagues on the chicken run. Clearly he does not believe that the Chancellor or the Government have done enough to make it likely that the people of Blackpool, South will return him to the House at the next election.

It was the Conservatives, not us, who said that the Budget was designed to kick-start their political recovery. But the muted cheer when the Chancellor sat down, and the look of despair on the faces of Conservative Members, told us the real story. They knew that if that was the objective of the Budget, it had failed.

I was interested to read in the Independent on Saturday something attributed to the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend). I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is not in his place now, but I expect that he will return. Talking about the amount of money that the Chancellor should give away, he was quoted as saying:

"At £10 billion I think that we would win the next election, at about £6 billion we could be in with a chance, but if it is only £2 billion or £3 billion we can forget it."

Right on cue, the hon. Member for Bridlington has walked back into the Chamber.

It is obvious what has happened today. Conservative Members have had to change their tune. They were led to believe that there would be huge tax hand-outs yesterday, so today they have had to make different speeches, in praise of alleged prudence on the part of the Chancellor.

The Chancellor has not revived the Conservatives' fortunes, because he cannot. In particular, he has failed to revive the country's long-term economic prospects. I was amused, as I suspect others were, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he had half thought of entitling his Budget, "A Budget for lasting prosperity"—but of course, we have all come to admire his sense of humour.

After 17 relaunches, the Tory party is still searching for a solution, and the Budget, like the Queen's Speech, has proved something of a damp squib. As my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) said, the Queen's Speech was supposed to smoke us out, but instead people saw the bankruptcy of the Conservative party's policies and position.

The Budget is no different. It was supposed to be designed for political purposes and to breathe life into the Conservative party, but it failed to do so. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said, the Conservatives are prisoners of their own political and economic failure. After 16 years they are running out of ideas and have no sense of direction.

The flagship of the Budget was supposed to be a dramatic cut in income tax, but when it came it was just one penny. The best that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury could say was that it was "plausible". That is not much in the way of praise. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman's contribution was notable for the fact that he said little about the Budget, contenting himself with making several allegations about our position, which he then had to withdraw.

There we have it—a cut of only one penny, after everything that the Government have said. Seven pence up since 1992, one penny down in 1995. And that comes from a Government who have given us 21 different tax rises since 1992. I notice that over the past three years there has been no word about the money that was taken away in tax belonging to the taxpayers. Today, apparently, only the one penny belongs to the taxpayers, not the six pence that has also been taken from them since 1992.

At the general election the Government promised to reduce taxes year on year. And they promised a recovery that would start the day after the election. No wonder people do not trust the Government, or believe a word that they say. Even after the Budget an average family is about £670 worse off than it was at the last election. What the Government give with one hand they take away with the other, and people know that. They know income tax is down by one penny, and they will welcome that partial relief, but they also know about the increased charges, the increased rail fares caused by the privatisation of British Rail and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) said, increased council tax.

Mr. John Townend: The hon. Gentleman talks about an increase in taxes "equivalent" to 7p in the pound, then compares it with a reduction in the standard rate of 1p in the pound. To be consistent, if he is talking about equivalent tax reductions he should compare them with equivalent tax increases. The figures are not 7p and 1p, but 7p and 2½p.

Mr. Darling: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. I thought that he was going to help clarify what he was reported as saying in the Independent on Saturday. I will not repeat it, because he obviously knows what he said to Colin Brown, the paper's chief political correspondent.

Before the Budget, and indeed in the House on many occasions, the hon. Member for Bridlington has made the point that he has felt let down by the Government putting up taxes. The 7p figure did not originate with us. We do not claim authorship of it. It came from the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. The public know that since the election taxes have risen by the equivalent of 7p in the pound, so the Conservatives cannot really expect gratitude for giving back 1p in the pound in the meantime. [Interruption.]

I want to reply to the many points that were made in the short time available. One point, in respect of— [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There are too many seated interventions.

Mr. Tim Smith rose—

Mr. Darling: I think that the hon. Gentleman was one of those shouting from a sedentary position. I may give way to him later if I have time, but not at the moment.

I want to deal with a point made by the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). He was good enough to write to me to say that he could not stay for the entire debate. No doubt he will read what is said. He made the point, as have other Conservative Members, that a number of my Back-Bench colleagues have said things that might be interpreted as a call for further expenditure. He did that having just asked for further expenditure on the roads programme in East Anglia.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk made that statement quite properly as the Member for an East Anglian constituency. Government Members and the chairman of the Conservative party should think long and hard about the implications of what they are doing. Are they saying that Back-Bench constituency Members cannot make constituency points in support of their constituents' position, advocating certain courses of action, such as the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Sir A. Bowden), who said that he wanted to do something with VAT on energy efficiency, like the hon. Member for Bridlington, who suggested an increase in VAT—

Mr. Townend indicated dissent.

Mr. Darling: Yes he did; earlier this evening he suggested an increase of 1 per cent.

Such points are legitimately made by Back-Bench Members of Parliament and it really is disingenuous for the Conservative party to interpret them as being the position that a party might take at a general election, any more than Labour Members would be correct to say that just because one Tory Back-Bencher said something, whether on the Clive Anderson show or in this place, somehow the whole weight of the party is thrown behind it. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk, who is an intelligent man, might want to reflect on the implications of what he said.

Sir Andrew Bowden: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: Yes, but it will have to be the last intervention because I do not want to spoil the Minister's winding-up speech.

Sir Andrew Bowden: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a difference between an individual Back Bencher presenting a case that might have a constituency connotation or a special interest, and an impression given by an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman—without saying so but implying it quite clearly so that the public assume it—that if his party wins, it will spend more money in a particular area?

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), the Conservative party chairman, has been attributing commitments to the Labour party by listening to Back Benchers. I am sure that the Government would not claim that what the hon. Gentleman said this evening, or indeed what the right hon. Member for South Norfolk said, was Government policy. Unless we expect Members of Parliament no longer to advocate the interests of their constituents in this place—where after all they ought to do it—we should think long and hard about the consequences of the comments of the right hon. Member for South Norfolk.

[Mr. Darling]

As my hon. Friends have said, the Government's Budget was no surprise. The Chancellor's room for manoeuvre was restricted. Public borrowing is higher than forecast—this year it is £29 billion and forecast to move upwards in the next three years. There is slower growth and the Chancellor tells us that he thinks that there will be growth of some 3 per cent. in future. No wonder he is straining credibility.

Of course a great deal is perilled on this high growth. If next year the Chancellor is going to be able to mount a giveaway Budget—there will be pressure from Conservative Members on him to do so—that promised growth will have to be delivered. However, the record does not suggest that he is likely to be successful. The Chancellor wants us to believe that next year will somehow be different from past years. We have had higher inflation than the Chancellor predicted and the current account deficit is worse this year than he predicted.

Investment—the future for long-term sustainable economic growth—has of course been cut. There are some things that we do welcome, such as the move to simplify tax, but we think that the Government should do more to prevent tax evasion and to close tax loopholes.

I welcome the Chancellor's move to clarify and improve the position with regard to share ownership. We believe that employees should be encouraged to have a stake in their firm and that such a stake should be open to everyone from the boardroom to the shop floor. However, shares and options should be given as a reward for success. They should not be granted in anticipation of success that may never come, and they should encourage saving.

We shall have to see what provisions there are in the Finance Bill, but it would be wrong for us not to welcome the fact that the Government have moved in a direction that we have advocated for much of the last 12 months. I am only sorry that the Government have done nothing about the abuses that are happening in the boardrooms of the privatised utilities.

We welcome the promotion of saving and what the Chancellor had to say on that. I listened to the Chancellor yesterday and I thought that I was listening to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East, who made exactly the same point some weeks ago. We wish to build on the PEPs experience and to create specific instruments that will encourage people to save in the medium and the long term.

We welcome what the Chancellor has done with regard to the excise duty on Scotch whisky. It is, however, to investment and the private finance initiative that I want to return since the Government have set so much store by it. The fact is that the PFI has never taken off. We have always supported the principle of the PFI. The deputy leader of the Labour party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), was the first to float that idea before the last general election. He was denounced at the time, and then the Government promptly accepted much of what he had said.

There are two problems with the PFI. First, it has been strangled by bureaucracy and by red tape. Every capital project has been channelled through the system, which has clogged it up. Secondly, the Government have never set a list of priorities. In 1992, the Government published a list that included 78 projects, ranging from the west coast main line upgrading to the car park at Eastbourne hospital. The private sector had no idea where the Government's priorities lay.

Two things are striking about the Government press release that was issued yesterday. First, the Government have accepted that there must be some degree of prioritisation and said that they will publish an illustrative list. In fact, 1,400 projects have appeared today with an A or a B against them. The Government have to do more to indicate their priorities as between projects that have a major strategic interest and those that have a lesser interest in relation to a national strategy. The private sector has told us and anyone who is prepared to listen that the great difficulty is that it has no idea which projects the Government are likely to favour and which they are not.

The Government's attachment to right-wing dogma has meant that they have privatised the decision-making process. It is for the Government to give a lead and then invite the private sector to contribute. If they did that, there would be a better chance of seeing more projects get off the ground and under way. Once we saw some projects get off the ground, more would follow.

The second interesting thing about the Government's press release yesterday is that they promised a further £14 billion of investment by 1998-99. Of course, that includes the £5 billion promised last year. Little of that £5 billion has found its way into agreed projects which have started. We are entitled to take with a degree of scepticism the Government's commitment that the PFI can take the place of public investment. It is planned that Government investment in the public sector will fall by almost 18 per cent. between this year and 1999. That is on top of a cut of 7.2 per cent. in real terms in the past three years.

Government direct investment in the national health service will be cut in real terms by 27 per cent. in three years. Given the lack of progress in the PFI, people are entitled to ask how the Government expect it to take the place of public investment. When the PFI was originally launched, it was suggested that it would represent additional investment. The clear lesson of what has happened in the past few years is that the PFI is not additional investment but a substitute for public sector investment. It is not even that, because little of it is getting off the ground. If the Government prioritised the projects that they would like to see get off the ground and broke down some of the bureaucracy and red tape that is created, some real progress would be made.

Indeed, anyone wanting a clue as to what is going wrong need look no further than a press release put out by the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which said that "too few people" knew how to exploit the initiative to its full advantage. That was why, the release continued, the right hon. Lady's Department had "established a hotline" on the matter. So, the people who brought you the coneline now bring you a new hotline to try to get the project off the ground. The Government really need to do more.

The projects are a matter of choice. In health the Government are spending £1 billion a year on bureaucrats, and not on front-line care. Why does a hospital need a press officer? In education, the Government have chosen to double the assisted places scheme instead of using the money to cap class sizes below 30.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) is not in his place, but it would be wrong of me not to reply to his point about his party's position on the Government's reduction in income tax and how that relates to education. I take with a great big pinch of salt what the Liberal Democrats have to say on this, as in all other matters. They are the people who said that the top tax rate should be 60p, and then said a week later that it should be 50p. They said that a penny should be put on tax for education, but then said that they would consult about it. They later said that they would make that tax increase if it was necessary.

When he was challenged today, the hon. Member for Gordon did not know what his party would do at the next election. I would say to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington)—who also raised the matter—that even if the Liberal Democrats' position were carried, there is no chance that one penny of that money would find its way back into the education Budget. That option does not lie with the Opposition, only with the Government. We believe that it is quite wrong to impose further taxation on people who are already paying more than ever before by way of tax. The people who would benefit from the education system are suffering now.

The Government's position simply does not add up. They have done nothing about tackling long-term unemployment. In one in five non-pensioner households, there is no work whatsoever, and the Government are doing nothing about that. We have made a firm proposal to implement a windfall tax, which we believe would have a major impact on getting people back to work. The Government's proposals make no economic sense and no social sense. The Budget deserves to be rejected for that reason, and for every other reason advanced tonight.

The Paymaster General (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): In his speech yesterday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor set out a Budget for this country's earners and savers, and a Budget that will spend more money on priority services while cutting the cost of government. It is quite clear from today's debate that that is strongly supported by my hon. Friends. It is clear too that the Opposition are in a muddle.

The Opposition are anxious to pose as the taxpayer's friend, and they have announced that they will not oppose the tax cuts—that was the one question answered by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown)—but they will not support them either. They will abstain—at least, most of them will do so. The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington), who is in his place, hinted that he would vote against the tax cuts. Old Labour has some principles left, but new Labour will heroically abstain on the central issues of the Budget. Very new Labour may come round to support the tax cuts; the lurch to the right in the Labour party is not over yet.

The confusion and muddle on the Opposition Benches has a simple cause. When a party such as Labour abandons all its traditions, dumps its baggage and disowns its past beliefs and becomes motivated solely by the desire for office, nothing keeps it together. That is why the Opposition's response to the Budget has been so shallow and opportunistic, and why the shadow Chancellor seemed genuinely incapable of answering simple points put to him by my hon. Friends. What was his inflation target? He did not have one. What was the cost of his 10p lower rate tax proposals? He did not know. Would he support our 20p savings rate? He would not say. Would he abolish the insurance premium tax, which he has opposed? He had no idea. Yet Labour claims to be the party of government in waiting.

The contrast between that policy vacuum and the Budget laid out by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not be clearer. We have balanced our tax-cutting proposals with similar cuts in public expenditure, while preserving areas such as health and education.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Sir A. Bowden) that the extra money for education must go through to the classroom. He clearly has a similar local education authority to mine and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King)—too much of the money sticks to the local authority and never gets to the classroom.

We have increased priority expenditure by a further drive on waste and on fraud in social security expenditure and by delivering year-on-year cuts in the expenditure of Whitehall Departments. That has been driven through by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and I am pleased that the policy had the strong support of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and others.

The civil service is now more than 30 per cent. smaller than it was in 1979. In the next three years, the cost will fall by a further £2 billion in real terms. As the Government are the largest service industry in the country, it is right on economic grounds alone that they should also be the most efficient. The relentless drive for efficiency over that part of the economy that the Government control is without doubt one reason why the performance of the British economy generally has been so much better in recent years than in the 1970s.

Even employment, which cropped up again and again in the debate, is showing signs of a successful recovery. Unemployment is lower than in Germany, France or Italy, and we have the highest proportion of people in work of any major European economy. Of course, there are regional variations and I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Hicks) said, even though the bulk of his remarks about the distribution of the funding formula were perhaps more accurately directed at my right hon.

[Mr. David Heathcoat- Amory]

Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. He will be listening and has already listened to representations from the west country and other regions.

There were persistent calls for more Government investment—an echo that we heard in the past from the Opposition. They still believe that unemployment can be solved and investment increased simply by spending more Government money. If they should have learnt anything from the sad experiences of the 1970s, it is that a thriving economy is created not by the Government but by a successful private sector.

I shall take one example—the small companies rate of corporation tax was 42p in the pound when Labour left office in 1979, but we have reduced it to 24p in the pound. We have nearly halved the tax rate on those successful companies. That does far more for growth, investment and employment than any of the spending schemes dreamt up on the Opposition Benches.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) asked what the Government had done for industry, but I say that industry and business generally now have a choice. They will get something from Labour and, indeed, from the Liberal Democrats—the social chapter of the treaty of Rome. The Leader of the Opposition did not seem to understand it when he spoke to the Confederation of British Industry recently, but the fact is that the provisions of the social chapter—its red tape and regulations—could be imposed on us by majority voting. It is no good him saying that he would pick and choose and take only those bits that he liked. That is what Labour offers—the social chapter, and imposed on us if necessary. The choice is between that and what we offer.

We have delivered in this Budget alone a further income tax cut, a cut to the small companies rate of corporation tax, further relief from capital gains tax for those who are retiring, lower inheritance tax and a cut in national insurance contributions—funded from a tax on landfill waste—which alone will be worth £500 million off that tax on employment. We have also given more generous transitional relief for business rates. That is how to promote growth, investment and jobs.

As regards taxation, there was not only muddle on the Labour Front Bench but a persistently expressed resentment on the Labour Back Benches that there should be tax cuts at all in the Budget. That was true not only of the Labour party but of the Liberals. It was revealing yesterday that the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) described income tax cuts as a bribe. Conservative Members do not think that it is a bribe when people keep more of what they earn and save; it is their money. It shows how illiberal and statist the Liberals have become that they think that money belongs to the Government to be dished out as they like.

We are on target for our 20p basic rate and the Budget achieves that for savers. They will pay tax at a basic rate of 20p from April next year. We have also achieved our target for the quarter of all taxpayers who will now pay tax on their income at only 20p in the lower rate band. The penny off the basic rate cuts marginal rates for 18 million people, who have no hope of anything similar from the Opposition.

What did we get from the Opposition? As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) said, Labour's tax and spending plans do not add up. Right through this debate and the debate on the Queen's Speech, we had calls for more public expenditure. Earlier today, in the social security statement, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), who leads for the Opposition, spent £1 billion in a few minutes in responding to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

The socialist wing of the Labour party clearly believes—and always has believed—in high and rising public expenditure. That is an article of faith. I do not agree with it, but I have some respect for views constantly held and consistently argued. I have no respect for the new Labour pretence that it can all be done without putting up taxes.

I read the shadow Budget of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. There was nothing in it about levels of borrowing, expenditure or interest rates and the only thing about taxation was the new 10p in the pound rate for the lower band. It was, of course, not costed—there was nothing so awkward as having to find the money for it.

Mr. Darling: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I still have some points to answer and only three minutes in which to do so.

As a preface to the shadow Budget, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said:

"I want to see openness and honesty in tax."

He could have started by applying those precepts to his own Budget.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) is not in his place. He gave notice that he would not be and I will have to send him a message through the Official Report that he is not exempt from a similar criticism. His shadow Budget, his so-called costed programme, for nearly £6 billion of extra expenditure was going to be paid for by "tax changes"—they are called not tax increases but tax changes—of £1.1 billion. Another item was "tax reform" of £990 million. There are no details about the reforms or the tax changes. If one reads "tax increases" for "tax reforms", one begins to realise that the words "openness" and "honesty" take on bizarre meanings in the mouths of Opposition spokesmen.

The central fact is that government is not like that: we are about having to take hard decisions and make difficult choices. We have not flinched from that and the economic indicators are now pointing in the right direction. Inflation is low, growth is up, unemployment is down, borrowing is declining, investment is increasing and taxes have been cut. That may be bad news for the Labour party, but it is certainly very good news for Britain—and there is more to come. As we move towards the introduction of the Finance Bill later in the year, we shall, we hope, find out more about the Opposition's non-proposals.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

PETITION

Solicitors (Unprofessional Conduct)

Sir Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): With your permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I beg leave to present a petition, signed by more than 3,700 people, requesting that an independent regulator consider complaints against solicitors for unprofessional conduct. The petition states:

That until the Law Society and the Solicitors Complaints Bureau are made accountable to an Independent Regulator members of the public remain open to abuse from the legal profession. A long overdue requested Public Inquiry into the handling by the Law Society and the Solicitors Complaints Bureau of Mary Blakeman's long standing complaints regarding a solicitor's unethical, unprofessional conduct will bring justification to bear on the issue. Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will give urgent consideration to this Petition to make effective its desire because in all areas JUSTICE A 'MUST' IS!

To lie upon the Table.

Libya and Iraq (Sanctions)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This is a debate about sanctions against two countries with which the United Kingdom has, historically, enjoyed excellent relations. Many of the decision makers in Libya and Iraq were educated in this country. As we debate the issue of sanctions, we also debate our country's long-term relations with two very important areas of the Arab world.

Anyone who visits Iraq must be dismayed that a once sophisticated society should be reduced to grinding poverty in many areas. Every recent visitor to that country—including the right hon. Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) and for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), the former leader of the Liberal party, and many others—is appalled, as I was, by the terrible conditions in the children's hospital in Baghdad or the conditions in another hospital at Um-Kasr on the Kuwaiti border. Infants, who cannot conceivably be responsible for any of the horrors of the past 10 years, expired in my presence—and I do not exaggerate.

The most recent visitor to Iraq with whom I have been in contact is Riad El-Taher, an Iraqi-born British subject. He is concerned about the British Government's entrenched support for United Nations Security Council resolution 986. He writes:

"Can I bring to your attention . . . the long term erosion of trust and historical ties taking root among the upcoming generation".

I sensed that during my visit.

"The majority of UK educated Iraqis are reaching retirement age and are being replaced by a generation fed on suspicion of the West and particularly Britain's continued support of sanctions."

I mentioned that issue at Question Time, and I say as gently as I can, and I hope without giving offence, that I wonder whether the Minister, his colleagues and his civil service advisers really realise the extent to which a generation is growing up about to hate the west—people who have been trading partners and friends. It is tragic.

"UNSCR 986 is heavily biased, being intrusive, divisive and certainly not addressing the chronic humanitarian shortages of food and medicine. These shortages are felt most strongly among the young generation . . . and the salaried sector in general. The financial benefit, if Iraq manages to sell the allocated oil, after deduction of the heavy burden of reparations, administration and allocation to the Northern Governorate under UN supervision, will be in the region of 7-8 US$ per person per month (outside Iraq)."

That places seriously in question the assertions that it is simply up to Saddam Hussein to change policy, and all will be well. I fear that the detail of what is happening shows that that certainly would not be the outcome.

One is forced to take the view that UNSCR 986 was not intended to provide humanitarian aid to the Iraqi people, in view of five factors. Both the UK and USA hold substantial Iraqi frozen assets, which could be controlled effectively for the sole purchases of badly needed food and medicine from their respective countries and for immediate release. Even if Iraq were prepared to agree to UNSCR 986, there are no guarantees that funds would be available from the sale of oil or for the purchase of humanitarian requirements, due to the complexity of the contractual demands. The reparations burden should be set aside at this stage, as Iraq can tackle that issue when sanctions are lifted. The rest of the argument is well known to the Foreign Office.

I simply say to the Minister, and through him to the Foreign Secretary, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Foreign Secretary should go to some of his constituents, the Church and Nation Committee of the Church of Scotland—he represents many of the leading members of the Church of Scotland in the Pentlands constituency of Edinburgh—and speak to them about their detailed knowledge and their knowledge of the humanitarian position.

Hansard records that, on 21 December 1988, I raised the subject of Libyan sanctions in the House. From new year's eve 1988, for reasons that I have outlined in seven previous Adjournment debates, I have had a deep interest in the subject.

Tonight, I make two requests. First, is it not time, after seven years, that the crucial timing device is produced? Let independent experts examine the timing device, because so far only photographs have been produced, and the head of the firm of manufacturers, Edwin Bollier, and his engineer, Ulrich Lumpart, have not even been allowed to see it.

I ask specific questions of which I gave notice to the Lord Advocate and the Crown Office in Edinburgh, which they undertook to pass on to the Minister. Is the Minister aware that Thomas Thurman, the Federal Bureau of Investigation officer who claims to have identified the timing device, is under investigation by the US Justice Department regarding allegations by a fellow FBI officer, Frederick Whitehurst, that he fabricated evidence and committed perjury in a murder trial in the USA? That was outlined in The Scotsman by a remarkable reporter, Stephen Breen. I have cross-checked with other sources, however.

Does the Thurman/White House situation lead Her Majesty's Government at least to question the credibility of Thurman, and the credibility of the Crown's identification of the timing device? Should Thurman be found guilty of perjury, would the Crown reassess the evidence and case against the two Libyans, given that the timing device is the key evidence linking the Libyans and the bombing?

The whole story of so-called evidence from Mary's House in Valletta, and the 18 different identifications of Tony Gouchie, would be very flimsy in any court of law. Where, we ask, is this timer? Has it ever been out of the United Kingdom? Who found it? When was it found, and where? The imagination boggles. A timer supposedly in pristine condition was out in a Scottish winter for 15 months or so. I do not believe that the timer on the Pan Am clipper "Maid of the Seas" is in the possession of the authorities; I believe that they have a photograph of a rather different timer.

I have done my best in regard to my next point, and I also understand the Prime Minister's reasons. Before my question to him about the last issue that I shall raise is dealt with, let me issue a request that serious consideration, at least, be given to the Libyan suggestion of a trial in The Hague, under Scottish rules of evidence and under a Scottish judge. I feel that, after seven years, there is a strong argument for considering that as a serious possibility.

I am pleased to see that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) is present, because he has had a deep interest in Malta ever since we worked together when he led the Labour European delegation to the European Parliament. He had a good deal to do with Malta then. I shall not speak for my right hon. Friend, however; I shall speak for myself.

I do not believe that there ever was a Malta connection. We had hoped, yet again—along with the relatives, who have been steadfast and will not go away—to see the Prime Minister before these questions were asked. I do not believe in yah-boo Prime Minister's Question Time. The Prime Minister wrote to me:

"I have considered carefully whether I might meet Jim Swire, Pamela Dix and Martin Cadman before your question. Unfortunately I fear that my diary is such that there will be no possibility before then."

The offer has been made, but I hope that the Government will look carefully at the possibility of a trial in The Hague to bring the matter to a head.

I suspect that the reason why the Government do not want to go to The Hague is quite simple: they realise only too clearly that a Scottish judge, under Scottish rules of evidence, might well humiliate them by saying at an early stage that there was no case to answer.

It really is unrealistic to suggest that the Libyan Government ought to send the two to Britain. If the boot were on the other foot, would Her Britannic Majesty's Government extradite two men whom her country believed to be innocent to Libya, with which Britain has no extradition treaty? I doubt whether any British Government or the House would do any such thing. After seven years, the time has come to take some action, at least to try The Hague, because, if not, the suspicion exists that the Governments of the United States and Britain do not want the truth about Lockerbie.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): I should like to begin with a few general points on the use of sanctions. The decision to impose sanctions on a country cannot be taken lightly. Under the UN charter, if a country threatens international peace and security, as both Iraq and Libya have done, the Security Council is empowered under chapter 7 of its charter to take action. On that point, I should like to clarify why there are sanctions on Iraq and Libya and not on Nigeria. The human rights abuses in Nigeria, while abhorrent, are an internal situation and therefore cannot be classified under this chapter.

As much as possible, sanctions are tailored to ensure that they are not just punitive but counter the wrong that has been committed. The aim of sanctions is to counter threats to peace and security, and to try to get the penalised country back into line with the international community. That approach is reflected in our policy towards Libya and Iraq, in which sanctions play a central part.

Before I respond to the specific points raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), I shall recall the reasons behind the sanctions against Libya and Iraq—first, Libya.

Sanctions were imposed by the Security Council in March 1992 and in November 1993 because Libya had failed to comply with the requests of the United Kingdom, United States and French Governments, following the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie on 21 December 1988 and a Union des Transports Aérien aircraft over Niger in September 1989. It is worth reflecting just for a moment on the scale of those outrages. The first involved the death of 270 innocent persons; the second, 171—a total of 441 victims.

After the biggest criminal investigation in British history, the Dumfries and Galloway constabulary had by November 1991 uncovered sufficient evidence to enable charges to be brought against two Libyan nationals in connection with the Lockerbie bombing. The UK and the US called on the Libyan Government to surrender the accused for trial, to tell what they knew of the crime, and to pay appropriate compensation.

The Libyan Government failed to do any of those things. Through UN Security Council resolution 731, in January 1992, the international community endorsed the UK and US calls on Libya in connection with Lockerbie, and the French calls regarding UTA, but still Libya failed to comply. The sanctions resolutions 748 and 883 were designed to put pressure on the Government of Libya—not its people—to surrender the suspects for trial and to meet the other requirements. We regret that Libya has still not complied. By its failure to do so, it continues to deny justice to the victims or to prove the innocence of the accused.

The House will recall that, on 1 February this year, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), who was then Foreign Secretary, reported exchanges that Foreign Office officials had been having with the Libyans about the material and financial assistance that Libya had given to the Provisional IRA, at a time when it was waging a terror campaign against British interests. That was in the context of one of Libya's obligations under the resolutions: to demonstrate its renunciation of terrorism.

At the time, there remained some unanswered questions. Since then, there has been another exchange of questions and answers. As a result, on 20 November last, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office issued a statement making it clear that, while there remained gaps and omissions in the information given by the Libyans, we were satisfied that, when the disclosures were considered in their entirety, they largely met our expectations.

In acknowledging that as a positive step towards Libyan renunciation of terrorism, a path that we hoped that Libya would follow, we made it clear that we regarded Libya's co-operation as just one step in the context of one of its obligations under the resolutions. We remained committed to the UN sanctions against Libya until such time as Libya complied with all the requirements, in particular that it surrender those accused of the Lockerbie bombing for trial in Scotland or in the United States. I can tell the House that we have no further questions to put to the Libyans about that.

At the most recent four-monthly review of sanctions by the Security Council of 22 November, the UK permanent representative to the United Nations, Sir John Weston, drew the attention of the Security Council to the statement on the Provisional IRA questions. He added that we remained committed to bringing to justice those responsible for the Pan Am and UTA bombings, and that alternatives put forward by the Libyans for trial elsewhere—including The Hague, as the hon. Gentleman said—were simply not acceptable. Sir John Weston reminded the council that all countries must continue to implement the mandatory sanctions rigorously. There was no proposal at that review for a change to the existing sanctions, and they must therefore remain in force.

We have regularly and carefully considered the various proposals that have been put forward from time to time that a trial be held in a third country, and we remain convinced that they are unacceptable and unworkable. The reasons have been stated before in the House, but since the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter, they bear repeating.

First, the practical and legislative difficulties would be enormous. They would involve secondary and possibly primary legislation in both countries.

Secondly, it would be quite unacceptable to the Government, as well as to the House, effectively to allow suspected terrorists to dictate where and how they should be tried. The Scottish and US courts both have jurisdiction. The trial should be held in one of those jurisdictions.

Thirdly, the Security Council resolutions call for a trial in the UK or the US.

Fourthly, holding the trial in a third country might imply that the Lockerbie suspects could not get a fair trial in Scotland. The Libyan Government indicated in 1993 that they accepted that the suspects would get a fair trial in Scotland.

Finally, even if it were possible to set up such a court, there is no credible guarantee that the suspects would be made available for trial. Even if all the other difficulties that I have just outlined were resolved, I would be most reluctant to set in motion a complex procedure of legislation and international agreements that could too easily lead to nothing.

The Libyan Government have never undertaken to hand the accused over for trial anyway. Indeed, they have maintained that they have no powers to force the suspects to go for trial anywhere. Against that background, the scope for further prevarication after all the arrangements had been put in place would be enormous. So for all those reasons, we have concluded that a trial in a third country remains unacceptable.

We understand that the proposal currently preferred by the Libyans, and endorsed by the Arab League, is a trial before Scottish judges under Scottish law at the seat of the International Court of Justice in The Hague. As I have said, that proposal is unacceptable, for the same reasons as any trial in a third country.

We are conscious that Libya has been under the pressure of sanctions for over three and a half years. Libya's attempts to promote so-called compromise solutions and alternatives to trial in Scotland and the US show that the pressure is having an effect, and we should not waver. The pressure should remain on Libya until it does what the international community demanded in 1992. We ask no more or less than that.

In the meantime, we must at all costs avoid prejudicing the trial. For that reason, we cannot, as has been suggested, show the timer used in the explosion to its manufacturer, or, for that matter, disclose any of the other evidence.

[Mr. Jeremy Hanley]

The hon. Gentleman referred to the activities of Mr. Thomas Thurman, an American forensic scientist. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), told the hon. Gentleman on 10 November that the forensic examination in the Lockerbie investigation was conducted by the Royal Armaments Research and Development Establishment. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate told the hon. Gentleman on 6 October that the Lockerbie case did not depend on any evidence that Mr. Thurman might give.

What may or may not have happened in the United States to cause the FBI to investigate the activities of Mr. Thurman has no bearing on the evidence that forms the basis of the Scottish petition warrant.

Widely diverging stories have appeared in the press and elsewhere on the recovery of fragments of the timer in that case. Those stories have been based on speculation, and it should therefore come as no surprise that they are indeed divergent. I can go into no further detail on the evidence, which includes recovery of any of the physical evidence, for fear of prejudicing the case.

As in the case of Libya, the aim of sanctions against Iraq is clear. It is to ensure that Iraq fully complies with its obligations under the relevant UN Security Council resolutions. It is simply not true to say that sanctions are not working. They have achieved a measure of Iraqi compliance with the requirements of UN Security Council resolutions—notably, Iraqi recognition of Kuwait and UN-demarcated borders.

Without the pressure of sanctions, it is unlikely that Iraq would have revealed to the UN special commission information on its development of weapons of mass destruction. UNSCOM has recently discovered the horrifying capabilities that Iraq has tried to conceal: enough chemical and biological weapons to kill the world's population several times over. UNSCOM's work on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme is essential for the security of the region, indeed the world. We give it strong support.

Nevertheless, Iraq still falls short of its other obligations. Time permits me to mention only a few. First, despite UNSCOM's recent discoveries, much remains to be done in respect of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme. Secondly, Iraq has an appalling human rights record. To hon. Members who have a strong stomach, I commend the recent report by the UN's special rapporteur on human rights, Mr. van der Stoel, which recounts nauseating acts of torture committed by the Iraqi regime, as well as denial to Iraq's population of the most basic human rights. Thirdly, Iraq has failed to account for the whereabouts of more than 600 missing Kuwaiti and third-country nationals and property, including military hardware, stolen from Kuwait.

Recent history shows that Saddam Hussein cannot be given the benefit of the doubt. The UN Security Council reviews sanctions every 60 days in the light of Iraq's behaviour. At the last review on 8 November, it agreed that sanctions could not be modified. There is no doubt that that was right. Sanctions must be maintained until Iraq fully complies with its international obligations under relevant UN Security Council resolutions.

We share the concern of many right hon. and hon. Members about the desperate plight of Iraqi citizens. The hon. Member for Linlithgow said that we were making enemies of a whole generation of young Iraqis, but I wonder whether it is right to make enemies of the rest of the world. It is nonsense to blame the shortages and deprivations on the UN. Food and medicines are not subject to sanctions.

Rather than buy food, Saddam Hussein has chosen to spend the regime's limited resources on military procurement, ostentatious construction projects and luxury items for his hangers-on. For example, Mr. van der Stoel notes that members of the Ba'ath party and military officers have their own food distribution network. Saddam, not the UN, bears full responsibility for the suffering of the Iraqi people.

To try to alleviate the suffering of the Iraqi people, the UK played a leading role in the unanimous adoption of UN Security Council resolution 986, which would allow Iraq to export a substantial quantity of oil in return for humanitarian aid. The resolution was designed to accommodate criticisms of earlier offers made by the UN under resolutions 706 and 712. It increases the amounts of oil that Iraq could export and is more flexible in the arrangements for monitoring distribution of supplies. Were it to implement resolution 986, Iraq could purchase substantial amounts of humanitarian supplies. The hon. Gentleman said that this was about $6 or $7 per person per month. That is approximately $2.5 billion-worth per annum. That compares with $5 billion spent on all civilian goods before the Gulf war. Sadly, Iraq has refused to implement it. We urge Iraq to implement this humanitarian resolution, to relieve the suffering of the Iraqi people.

We have also been helping the Iraqi people more directly. Since 1991, we have given more than £72 million to the humanitarian effort in Iraq. The Overseas Development Administration is also spending substantial sums on aid to Iraq this financial year. I pay tribute to the British and other humanitarian non-governmental organisations working in the area, and to the group from the Scottish churches. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State asked me to meet them only last week. I did, and I was pleased to listen to them and discuss matters, but they too recognise that resolution 986 has been implemented by a unanimous international agreement.

The recent developments in the resolution of the Bosnia crisis are an example of sanctions being effective. The promise of the suspension of sanctions was a key factor in bringing President Milosevic to the negotiating table in Dayton, and in bringing about the signing of the peace agreement. The resulting UN resolution which the Security Council adopted last week was a just reward for that achievement.

Let us pray that the leaders in Libya and Iraq rise to their responsibilities, and take the necessary steps to help their people to answer those who demand justice, and to rejoin the international community of good will whose only aim is to work for peace.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes to Eleven o'clock.

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN

QUEEN'S SPEECH (ANSWER TO ADDRESS)

THE VICE-CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's answer to the Address, as follows:

I have received with great satisfaction the loyal and dutiful expression of your thanks for the speech with which I opened the present Session of Parliament.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Unlawful Actions

1. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the last two years his actions have been declared unlawful in the courts. [1351]

5. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions his policies have been the subject of court decisions. [1356]

7. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to public funds since 1979 of judicial reviews following which his actions as Minister have been judged unlawful. [1358]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): Hundreds of applications for judicial review are made each year. Detailed information on individual cases is not collected centrally. The vast majority of cases are judged by the courts to be without foundation. No information is available on the total cost of the applications.

Mr. Banks: I actually asked how many of the Home Secretary's actions over the past two years had been declared unlawful. The answer is squillions, it seems to us. If the Home Secretary were not so smug, complacent and arrogant, he would not get turned over in the courts so often. Why does he not start listening to his own advisers and experts, and other people who know about such things? Or is he satisfied to carry on following his own prejudices? If he carries on like that, he will become known as the old lag of British politics.

Mr. Howard: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be encouraged and much comforted to know that the proportion of cases that succeed is not as high as it used to be. The difficulty is that the many cases that fail just do not seem to get as much publicity as the few that succeed.

Mr. Skinner: Why does the Home Secretary not have the nerve to admit that he has persistently offended—nine times since he has had his present job? Is he aware that Government money is available for sending young children who are persistent offenders on safari trips? We would be prepared to fund one for him. Better still, he could go to California, where if someone persistently offends, not nine times but three times, it is "Three strikes and you're out."

Mr. Howard: I had not intended to visit California in the summer recess, but now that I know that the hon. Gentleman will fund my visit I shall certainly consider going.

Mr. Cunningham: The Home Secretary has demonstrated by his reply that he is a bad bookkeeper. Can he explain why, although the Prime Minister said that there would be an extra 5,000 police officers over the next two or three years, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, through the local authority standard spending assessments, has cut £80 million off local authority budgets—budgets that have to provide for the fight against crime?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. The police settlement has increased by 4 per cent. for the forthcoming year, and that will include funding to pay for the extra officers that the Prime Minister announced to the party conference. We are making good the promises that we made.

Mr. Charles Wardle: If the European Court of Justice feels able to make a mockery of his decisions on excluding foreign nationals on the ground of national security, what does my right hon. and learned Friend think that it will do with our internal frontier controls and the legally worthless 1985 declaration, which for years senior officials and legal advisers have told the Government has no protection in law?

Mr. Howard: As my hon. Friend knows, we have made clear on many occasions our determination to maintain our frontier controls. As for this morning's decision, to which I believe my hon. Friend was referring, it goes not to the substance of the exclusion order-making power, but only to procedures. So far as I can see, the only likely effect is that those subject to it are likely to be detained in custody instead of being allowed to leave the country while the exclusion order is being considered.

Sir Teddy Taylor: How on earth can the Home Secretary justify or explain the European Court's statement that this country unlawfully excluded people who were a threat or a danger to this country solely because we were contravening article 9A of the Maastricht treaty, bearing in mind the assurances which the Government gave to the whole House during the debates on the treaty that security matters were entirely for this particular Government and other democratic Governments? Is not this a terribly serious issue? Will we now have to give compensation from taxpayers' funds to those whom we excluded on the ground of national security?

Mr. Howard: I have some sympathy with the views expressed by my hon. Friend, and I very much regret the European Court's decision. But it is a very narrow and limited decision which does not deal with the substance of the exclusion order power. The decision deals only with the procedural aspects of that power, and we shall resist—I believe successfully—any claim for compensation that is made.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Is it not the nature of my right hon. and learned Friend's Department to be subject to more judicial reviews than any other Department? Has life not become impossible for Ministers, whose every administrative decision is challenged in the courts? Is he aware that the courts are spending much more of their resources on dealing with judicial reviews than they want to, bearing in mind the rest of the ordinary activities of the courts? Is it not time that we seriously started to consider reducing the scope of that remedy?

Mr. Howard: It is certainly true that the number of applications for judicial review is increasing considerably. I am surprised at the enthusiasm which is shown for the process by Opposition Members. The shadow Lord Chancellor, Lord Irvine of Lairg, recently warned against "greater activism in judicial review".

He went on to describe some of the views recently expressed by judges as "contrary to the established law and usages of our country".

I have never gone that far.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Home Secretary agree that this morning's decision by the European Court simply declares what is, in almost every case, the existing practice—namely, that prevention of terrorism exclusion suspects are given the opportunity to make representations, that those representations are made to an entirely independent person and that the Government recognise that judicial review is a remedy which is available to all who are affected by Government action if permission is granted by a court? Will he tell his hon. Friends who have been babbling about the effect of Europe on this issue that, in fact, the Government have no difficulty whatsoever with this decision, which does not undermine the provisions of the prevention of terrorism Act in any significant way?

Mr. Howard: It is true that the decision does not undermine the provisions of the prevention of terrorism Act, and we would never allow the provisions of that Act to be undermined. But it is clear that the European Court takes a different view of the procedures that we follow.

Mr. Carlile: It does not.

Mr. Howard: Oh yes it does. We must consider the precise implications of that decision, which—as I have indicated to my hon. Friends—I very much regret. The only consequence of the decision appears to be that people who are suspected will have to be detained in custody, whereas now they do not have to be detained.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this House—the sovereign Parliament of the United Kingdom—has, year upon year, made its view on the prevention of terrorism exclusion orders abundantly plain? Does he agree that the House has stated that the Home Secretary should have the power to exclude those people? We are now told that there is something wrong with that arrangement because of a directive agreed 31 years ago when we were not members of the Community. Is not the sovereignty of this House at risk because of the European situation?

Mr. Howard: I would be more concerned if the effect of the decision was in any way to take away the powers of the Home Secretary to decide on exclusion, but it does not do that. The court has made a limited criticism of some of the procedures, but we can adapt our procedures without any difficulty. As I have stated, the only consequence of the decision is likely to be that people will have to be detained in custody while we consider their representations, whereas at present they can leave the country without being detained.

Fire Service

2. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the original estimate of fire service spending for 1995-96; and by how much this exceeds the amount of the capping limit for England and Wales. [1352]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): The estimate of revenue spending by fire authorities in England and Wales in 1995-96 is £1,324 million. One metropolitan fire authority—South Yorkshire—set a budget £640,000 above its provisional cap and this was accepted.

Mr. Jamieson: Is the Minister aware that the local authority associations are saying that, nationally, there is an £80 million shortfall on fire service expenditure? Given the grim picture for public expenditure next year, do not we face a serious funding crisis in the fire service? When will the Government listen to the local authority associations, the Audit Commission and many others, and face their responsibility for funding a vital emergency service?

Mr. Sackville: The hon. Gentleman mentions the Audit Commission, which said in its report that at least £67 million-worth of savings could be made if all fire authorities came up to best practice. I have no evidence to suggest that best practice is the maximum efficiency that can be reached. Extensive further efficiencies may be possible. The hon. Gentleman should remember that, in his county of Devon, the standard spending assessment for fire was increased by 9.5 per cent. this year.

Mr. George Howarth: May I welcome the Minister to his new responsibilities? Is he aware that although the Audit Commission report, "In the Line of Fire", suggested where savings might be made, it pointed out that there were serious structural problems in the method of funding fire authorities? Is he also aware that, within the past two years, the chief fire officer commented on the serious possibility of a funding crisis for fire authorities throughout the country? Is it not time that the Government stopped hiding behind statistics and got down to sorting out the serious structural funding problems within the fire services? Are they prepared to stand by and let a vital emergency service drift towards being unable to fulfil its functions?

Mr. Sackville: May I remind the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) that the responsibility for setting budgets for fire services lies with the fire authorities. They must satisfy themselves that they can fulfil their duties under the Fire Services Act 1947. It is open to them to set a budget above the Government's capping requirements if they can justify it, and one metropolitan county that did that last year had its budget allowed. If the hon. Gentleman is asking for extra spending on the fire service and everything else, how will he fund his party's promised reductions in income tax?

Crime, West Yorkshire

3. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to visit West Yorkshire in the near future to discuss crime levels. [1354]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to visit West Yorkshire. However, we congratulate West Yorkshire police force on the 10 per cent. reduction in vehicle crime, the 3 per cent. reduction in other theft, and the 5 per cent. reduction in burglary recorded in the 12 months to June 1995.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I congratulate the police, but will the Minister tell us how many extra police officers will be on the beat in West Yorkshire as a result of his proposals? Is he prepared to fund the pilot schemes like the one in my constituency, where two dedicated officers are funded by city challenge? Will he guarantee that, if those schemes are successful, they will receive long-term funding from the Home Office?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is behind the times. He should know that we do not dictate to chief constables how many officers they may have. As a matter of interest, with the funding made available to West Yorkshire since the Government came to power in 1979, there has been a 7 per cent. increase in police officers and a 65 per cent. increase in police civilian staff, allowing more bobbies to go on the beat. This financial year, the chief constable of West Yorkshire plans to recruit more bobbies and hopes to have 135 more this year alone.

Mr. Riddick: May I join my right hon. Friend in welcoming the chief constable's announcement of 135 new police officers by the end of this financial year? Is he aware that the chief constable has managed to achieve that by slimming down the bureaucracy in Wakefield and reducing the number of senior ranks? Does not that show that extra money from the Government is not always needed to put more police officers on the beat?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is right. That pattern is being repeated throughout the country. In nearly all police forces, chief officers have streamlined senior and middle ranks—particularly inspectors, chief inspectors and superintendents—and used the savings to recruit more constables. That means that more constables are out on the beat. They are available for operational duties and that practice has been encouraged by this Conservative Government. There is also the fact, of course, that the first thing that the Government did in 1979 was to recruit the 8,000 bobbies that that lot let slide.

Mr. Straw: Is the Minister aware that over the three years since the last general election, the number of police officers in West Yorkshire has gone down by 107 and across the country, according to the chief inspector's latest report, by 823—wholly contrary to a pledge given at the last general election of 1,000 more officers on the beat? Given that broken promise, what guarantee can the Minister give that the latest promise on police numbers of 5,000 over three years is going to be honoured or is that going to be yet another broken promise from the Tories?

Mr. Maclean: With that statistic, as with all the others that the hon. Gentleman uses, especially when he tries to compare falling crime in Britain with crime in other countries, he gets stuck at a particular point in time. He does not like to take the latest, up-to-date facts. He should be aware that the chief constable of West Yorkshire is predicting that by the end of this financial year, he will have 135 more bobbies. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that getting rid of senior ranks and recruiting constables instead puts more people on the beat, then God help this country if he were ever Home Secretary.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: When my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary visits West Yorkshire and meets the chief constable, could he suggest that when the chief constable deals with the case of PC Godber, the policeman who clipped a young thug round the ear, that police constable should be congratulated rather than disciplined?

Mr. Maclean: I am sure the House heard what my hon. Friend said and no doubt those remarks will be drawn to the chief constable's attention. Neither my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary nor I interfere in these disciplinary matters. Cases such as this come to the Home Secretary on appeal once the procedures have been followed. I could not comment.

Community Policing

4. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve community policing in the Thames valley. [1355]

Mr. Maclean: The Government fully support community policing and I want to congratulate the chief constable of Thames valley on setting objectives in the Newbury area to prevent vehicle crime, to prevent burglary, and to prevent misuse of drugs by an active programme of partnership and community intervention.

Mr. Rendel: I am delighted that the Minister congratulates the Newbury police force on its partnership with Newbury district council, which, as he knows, is Liberal Democrat-led. Given the fact that the violent crime record in the Thames valley is currently the second worst in the country and given the amount of money for new policing in the Budget for the next financial year, just how many of the much-trumpeted 5,000 extra police officers are going to be in place by the end of the next financial year?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait. I am not going to announce at this moment the settlement on police funding. He will have to wait at least an hour for that. The chief constable of Thames valley has been very successful in tackling crime. In the past two years, burglary has come down 20 per cent. total crime 13 per cent. 25,000 fewer crimes have been committed in the Thames valley; and theft is down 17 per cent. Where a chief constable finds that any particular sort of crime is rising, I am sure that he will use the increased resources that we have made available to target that crime. If there is an increase in robbery or violence, chief constables will use the resources to get those crimes down just as they have tackled other crime.

Mr. Simon Coombs: Speaking from the head-waters of the River Thames, may I say how warmly welcomed in my constituency was the Chancellor's confirmation of the recruitment of an additional 5,000 police officers across the country over the next three years, following as it did the news of the 5 per cent. fall in crime in the county of Wiltshire in the previous year? Will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that the ability of the chief constable of Wiltshire to deliver good community policing depends to a large extent on his ability to fulfil other responsibilities such as security in the county?

Mr. Maclean: I appreciate what my hon. Friend says. When he studies the settlement that we have made available, not only for Wiltshire but for all the other forces in England and Wales for which my right hon. and learned Friend has financial responsibility, I hope that he will conclude that Wiltshire has been well satisfied and has had not only its ordinary policing needs met but those for its special security responsibilities.

Europol

6. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to support the functioning of Europol; and if he will make a statement. [1357]

Mr. Howard: We already provide substantial support to the existing Europol drugs unit. We shall build on that commitment when Europol comes into operation. We expect Europol to make a very valuable contribution to the fight against international organised crime, particularly drug trafficking, in the European Union and more widely.

Mr. Rathbone: Although the House will welcome the Home Secretary's commitment to Europol, on which the British Government have given the lead right from its inception, I believe that there is general disappointment at the Government's inability to sign the convention supporting Europol. Can the Home Secretary inform the House that that difficulty will be overcome speedily?

Mr. Howard: I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that the convention was in fact signed in July following the agreement on it reached at the Cannes summit. We intend to ratify it shortly, and I hope that other countries will as well.

Mr. Henderson: As such matters must be dealt with at an intergovernmental level, does the Secretary of State accept that the House should be consulted more systematically on proposals, tentative agreements and agreements? Does he agree that there is a need for inter-country police co-operation to fight racist extremists in Europe? If he does agree, does he intend to conclude an agreement on these matters, and, if so, when?

Mr. Howard: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, the Europol convention was the subject of an explanatory note sent to Committees on 22 February 1994; supplementary notes were submitted on 17 November 1994 and 31 May this year; and the final text was deposited on 28 July.

On the hon. Gentleman's second point, I agree that there ought to be intergovernmental co-operation on racism and xenophobia. That is a very different matter, however, from a legally binding document that would require us to consider changing the laws of the United Kingdom in a way which does not meet our circumstances. That was something that I was not prepared to go along with in Brussels last week. If the hon Gentleman thinks that he would go along with that and that the United Kingdom should have signed up, perhaps he would be clear and say so.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with me that racism must be fought wherever it happens, whether on mainland Europe, in the United Kingdom or, indeed, in Leicester? Will he join me in condemning the Opposition spokesman, who was reported on "Dispatches" last night, for his outrageous, disgraceful racist comments?

Mr. Howard: We look forward to an explanation from the hon. Gentleman at the earliest possible moment.

Closed Circuit Television

9. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many closed circuit television schemes are financially supported fully or in part by the safer cities initiative. [1361]

Mr. Maclean: Forty-two CCTV schemes received funding under phase 1 of the safer cities programme, seven are being financially supported under phase 2, and of course 106 schemes were supported by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's challenge funding scheme.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister ensure that schemes such as that in Burnley, which are doing an excellent job, continue to have the necessary finances made available to them? Will he also give an assurance that steps will be taken to stop any illegal use of the tapes made in any of these schemes anywhere in the country?

Mr. Maclean: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall have another round of challenge funding. We have in fact announced another round of funding, and this time we are putting up not just £5 million but £15 million. We are inviting bids from all around the country, from communities large and small. A key condition of the funding is that there will have to be a code of practice on the proper use of video tapes. We shall also insist that if any scheme that is up and running wants any top-up funding, it should have a proper code of practice as well. I condemn totally the irresponsible use of any CCTV images for commercial gain.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the Minister agree that it is not just CCTV tapes which need to be looked at carefully, but police interview tapes? Will he look specifically at the bizarre and worrying case involving one of my constituents who bought, at a car boot sale, 20 police interview tapes marked "Essex and Cambridgeshire Constabulary", which contained highly confidential information, including an interview with a schoolmaster who was alleged to have interfered with a choirboy? That could have been highly damaging to individuals—[Interruption.] I do not know why Opposition Members are smirking and laughing—it is a serious matter. Will the Minister ensure that such an incident never recurs and will he comment on it?

Mr. Maclean: Inquiries are being made by the police. We must be careful about apportioning blame before the inquiries are completed. I understand from the reports that the police say that they have all their master tapes intact and it is likely, or certainly possible, that the tapes came from a solicitor—from the defence copy of the tapes, possibly from a practice from which a solicitor was eventually disbarred. I understand that to be the case and I would not wish to go further without having more information. I hope that when the facts are fully revealed we will not be blaming the police service.

Mr. Michael: As the Minister knows, the Labour party has encouraged the effective use of CCTV in cutting crime. He will share, as he has suggested, my concern about the sale of films. Does he agree that it would be tragic if public confidence was undermined by people selling surveillance films, whether from the police, the public sector or the private sector? We are willing to help the Home Secretary to pass legislation through the House quickly in this Session to outlaw such activity by anyone in the public or private sector. Will he accept our offer?

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman has said. We must be careful and I warn the House that we should not hype up the episode, which is probably just what the promoter of the film wants. We must not get the matter out of proportion. I condemn irresponsible use, but at times it is helpful for the police and others to release certain video tapes or for programmes such as "Crimewatch UK" to show them as it helps detection and prevention.

We do not want to prevent, through hasty regulation, the sensible use of pictures because of a shoddy, poor-quality, over-hyped film. There is hardly any material on the film from public CCTV and the little that was released by the police for promotional purposes was mostly from private videos inside buildings. The quality of the film was worse than Logie Baird's first pictures in 1925—the public should rightly condemn such rubbish by not buying it.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend think that the safer cities initiative is helped by racist comments such as those uttered on the "Dispatches" programme last night?

Mr. Maclean: I hope that the Opposition will respond quickly with a total denunciation of the comments and the colleague who made them. Racist comments of that nature are unacceptable from any quarter, particularly from Front-Bench spokesmen from a party which hopes one day to be in government.

Bingo

10. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for deregulating the bingo industry. [1362]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): We are at present reviewing the controls on bingo clubs as part of the Government's deregulation initiative.

Mr. Hutton: Does the Minister accept the need to establish a level playing field on which all sections of the gambling industry are able to compete against each other fairly? How much longer will bingo clubs in my constituency and elsewhere, which perform a valuable social role in the community, continue to face petty and bureaucratic restrictions on advertising and on the number of coin-operated machines that they contain?

Mr. Kirkhope: I am very pleased that the hon. Gentleman shares my concern and interest in the bingo industry; I have recently seen a number of groups representing the industry. I hope to be able very shortly to address the points that he has mentioned and help the bingo industry to achieve greater success in the future.

Mr. Whittingdale: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is impossible to lose more than a handful of pounds in the course of an evening's visit to a bingo hall, unlike a casino, where literally thousands of pounds can be lost in a short time? Does he agree that there is no reason for bingo to be subjected to the same degree of regulation as the casino industry? Will he consider subjecting the industry to the deregulation process?

Mr. Kirkhope: I shall certainly do so. My hon. Friend is right to refer to the difference between bingo and casinos and other forms of gambling. I am sure that the deregulation process can be selective in that way, but it is important to ensure that those who want to go about perfectly legitimate entertainment such as bingo should be able to do so with the minimum of regulation.

Capital and Corporal Punishment

11. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the possibility of restoring to the courts the option of capital and corporal punishment. [1363]

Mr. Howard: None. Capital punishment is a matter for the will of the House. I am not satisfied that corporal punishment would be useful in practice. It had virtually fallen into disuse some time before it was abolished.

Mr. Winterton: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend would not expect me to be happy with that reply. Does he accept that, as I believe, a decent and civilised society should be permitted to protect itself against an uncivilised, heinous and brutal act? I refer to the killing of women following rape, the killing of children following sexual molestation, the killing of police and prison officers in the course of their duty, killings resulting from terrorist bombs and bullets and killings resulting from premeditated armed robbery.

Is it not right that a civilised society should be able to protect itself from those brutal crimes, and is not the only answer capital punishment? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with me, speaking as a grandfather and father, that the phrase, "spare the rod and spoil the child" is more applicable today than it ever has been?

Mr. Howard: I tend to agree with my hon. Friend's last observation, and of course I agree with him that any civilised society must protect itself against barbaric behaviour of the type that he described. Where we differ is that I believe that there are other ways in which that protection can be provided, including the sentence of life imprisonment, but it is important that someone accountable to the House continues to have a role in deciding how long someone sentenced to life imprisonment should actually serve, including the minimum sentence for those who are convicted of the murder of police officers.

Mr. Soley: If the Home Secretary decided to support capital punishment, would he give an absolute guarantee to the House that he would first develop the scientific skills that were necessary to restore life to a person who had been wrongfully convicted?

Mr. Howard: It is true that the danger of miscarriages of justice and the impossibility of remedying them is one of the strongest arguments against capital punishment.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is highly likely that, if there were a referendum on the re-introduction of capital and corporal punishment, voters would vote for it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) has said?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend also agree that the Leader of the Opposition might consider corporal punishment for his Front-Bench spokesman on inner cities for his appalling racist comments reported on "Dispatches" on Channel 4 last night?

Mr. Howard: We condemn and deplore racist comments, whenever they are made, wherever they are made and whatever quarter they come from. I hope that the Opposition will take seriously the observations that were made in the House this afternoon and take appropriate action.

It is my impression that the Leader of the Opposition administers corporal punishment to members of his Front-Bench team almost daily.

Crime and Unemployment

12. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the relationship between crime levels and unemployment. [1364]

Mr. Maclean: A wide range of research studies, including those conducted by my Department, have failed to uncover any consistent causal link between unemployment and crime.

Mrs. Campbell: There is no excuse for committing a crime—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—but does the Minister consider that Government policies that produce high youth unemployment, inadequate youth training programmes and cuts in benefit for the under-25s create conditions in which crime and law breaking can thrive? Are not the Government's policies responsible for the continuing high level of crime?

Mr. Maclean: The admission in the first part of the hon. Lady's supplementary question will keep Alastair Campbell spin doctoring for the rest of this afternoon. If she does not want to believe Home Office research studies and studies from other independent researchers, perhaps she will believe the highly respected chief constable of Strathclyde who, last Saturday, poured cold water on her pet theories about unemployment and crime. If police chiefs throughout the country can see that, and we see it in our research studies, perhaps one day it will get through to the Opposition; but I am not hopeful.

Drug Trafficking

13. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to tackle the international trade in illegal drug trafficking. [1367]

Mr. Howard: The Government are committed to vigorous action at home and abroad to tackle international drug trafficking and other serious organised crime. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister recently announced a series of measures to improve law enforcement in that field, including a role for the Security Service in support of the police. We are also pursuing, with our European partners, an international initiative to improve drug interdiction in the eastern Caribbean.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that if illegal drug trafficking is to be combated, a high level of international co-operation will be required? Is he aware of the success of Operation De Niro which, with considerable British help, resulted in 88 arrests world wide and the seizure of $52 million, $11 million-worth of paintings and 9 tonnes of cocaine?

Mr. Howard: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and I am grateful to him for giving the House that example. The resources available to many of the organisations that are involved in international drug trafficking are far in excess of those available to a number of nation states. International co-operation, in which we play a prominent part, is essential if we are to combat the activities of those organisations effectively.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the Home Secretary agree that one of the problems involved in fighting crime such as drug trafficking is the fact that Great Britain is an island? Does he agree that the fact that the Government have cut the number of drug enforcement and customs officers and the number of officers available to both coastguards and others, has not really helped to stop the importation of drugs?

Mr. Howard: I entirely reject the hon. Gentleman's allegations. We are now concentrating on more effective measures—particularly the use of intelligence—so that we can target the offenders and deal effectively with this menace.

Immigration and Asylum

14. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the problem of illegal immigration and bogus asylum applications. [1368]

15. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to tackle bogus asylum claims and illegal immigration; and if he will make a statement. [1369]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I have received numerous representations on a wide range of asylum and immigration issues. My right hon. and learned Friend announced to the House on 20 November the further measures that he proposes to take to tackle the problems caused by unfounded asylum claims and illegal immigration.

Mr. Bruce: Does my hon. Friend agree that, by speeding up the handling of applications by genuine asylum seekers, we shall improve the position for those who are in real need and reduce the social security budget? Will my hon. Friend hammer the nail home once and for all and stress that that will improve race relations? The vast majority of bogus asylum seekers are now Europeans from the eastern bloc.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is right on every count. Nothing in our Bill is intended in any way to disadvantage the genuine asylum seeker. Britain has a proud record of looking after those in need of a place of safety, and we shall continue to maintain that record.

The Opposition have consistently accused us of introducing a racist measure. That sits ill with what was said by their spokesman, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). Before Opposition Members accuse us of racism, perhaps they will apologise for their spokesman.

Sir Michael Neubert: Did my hon. Friend read the story, earlier this week, of a man from Zaire on benefit who defrauded the British people of £1 million while awaiting a decision on his application for asylum? Does that not make our right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's action on asylum applications and illegal immigration very welcome? Would not any political party that failed to support such measures—Labour, Liberal or Monster Raving Loony—be absolutely barmy?

Miss Widdecombe: That is perfectly true. Moreover, only the Conservative party is prepared to tackle the problem. Indeed, the Opposition have not made up their minds whether to acknowledge that there is a serious problem. They say that, even if there is a problem, we should not get round to tackling it. It is true that our asylum procedures are heavily abused. It is also true that our social security system acts as a magnet for the unworthy, as does the ease with which people can work illegally in this country. We shall support British taxpayers, no matter what their ethnic origin. We shall ensure that those who are here lawfully are not taken for a ride by those who abuse our system.

Mr. Timms: I welcome the assurance given by the Home Secretary last week that Nigeria is not now being considered for inclusion on the white list. Will the Minister now put the minds of many people at rest by giving a similar assurance in respect of Sri Lanka, where many thousands of people have been forced to flee their homes in recent weeks because of the civil war?

Miss Widdecombe: We have made it very clear that, at an early stage of consideration of the Bill, we shall give an indication of our thinking on which countries should be designated. I am not willing to anticipate that announcement, and the hon. Gentleman must possess himself in patience.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 30 November. [1381]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Griffiths: Why is the Prime Minister undermining the Post Office price freeze by increasing tax on the post, taking £1 million every working day and forcing up the price of stamps? Is not this yet another case of higher Tory taxes and the Government giving with one hand and taking away with the other?

The Prime Minister: I can see that the hon. Gentleman was very carefully rehearsed for this week's soundbite. He should look at the record on the Post Office. If he does, he will see that stamp prices have been frozen for some time and that it is two and a half years since the last increase. That is the longest period of stability since the 1960s, and stamp prices continue to fall in real terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the extra resources for schools announced in the Budget are very good news? Will he also do everything in his power to encourage local authorities to ensure that that money is passed on to schools?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend touches on two important points. The increase in resources to schools through the local authority budget will be welcome. It is also important that it is clear to parents and to schools that the money provided to the local authority settlement for education should go to education.

Mr. Blair: Before asking my question, may I tell the Prime Minister that, on Northern Ireland, we reiterate our congratulations to all involved in the peace process? The American President's visit to Northern Ireland today marks a moment of history in which we all rejoice. May I express the hope that these new and strong voices for peace can drown out the old cries of violence and allow everybody, not just there but here, to unite and put aside their differences and work for a common end?

I do not know whether the Prime Minister remembers the Budget, but may I ask him to withdraw the remarks made by the Conservative party chairman, who has claimed that the Budget will make the average family in Britain £9 a week better off? Will he confirm that, of that £9, almost £7 has nothing to do with the Budget but has to do with the Conservatives' projection of wage increases next year? The real Budget figure is just over £2, and that does not take account of extra costs, charges and taxes. Is that right or wrong?

The Prime Minister: I welcome what the right hon. Gentleman had to say about Northern Ireland. The President's visit to Belfast this morning was a spectacular success and everyone welcomes what he has had to say about terrorism.

On the subject of withdrawing claims, the right hon. Gentleman, when he replied to the Budget statement, made a series of comments, the vast majority of which were specious, wrong or misleading. If he cares to examine them, he will find that those that were not wrong were misleading, and that those that were not misleading were wrong. My right hon. Friend said that people will be better off by £450 next year, and that is our expectation.

Mr. Blair: We are entitled to an answer on this point. The claim was made that people are £9 a week better off as a result of the Budget, but £7 of it comes from earnings rises next year as projected by the Conservative party. The true Budget figure is just over £2, and that is confirmed by the Treasury press release. Is that right or wrong? If it is right, does not it show how the Tories give with one hand and take with the other—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] They do not like it because it is true. If it is true, does not it also show that we can never trust the Tories on tax?

The Prime Minister: It really is a rich day for the soundbites. After all that they have said about the Budget, it is interesting to hear that the Opposition will not vote against the Budget provisions. They cannot say yes and they will not say no; they have at best a qualified "maybe" about the Budget. My right hon. Friend said that, next year, the average family will be around £9 a week better off and that is our expectation.

Returning to the issues of taxes and trust, does the right hon. Gentleman recall saying that he did not propose to put up taxes? Does he recall the deputy leader of the Labour party saying:

"high income levels are going to pay considerably more"

and that there would be a higher top rate of tax under Labour? There seems to be some difference of opinion between the right hon. Gentleman and his deputy. It does not matter if the deputy goes on shouting at me. It would be better if he stuck to the party line instead of behaving like the mouth of the Humber.

Mr. Blair: I shall tell the Prime Minister what people will recall at the next election. He went into the election saying that he would never raise VAT, and he raised it. [Interruption.] They can shout, but they will never again be trusted.

Madam Speaker: Order. I insist on the Leader of the Opposition being heard.

Mr. Blair: They want a question. Is it not the case that the Prime Minister went into the election promising not to raise VAT and then raised it? Is that simple enough for them?

The Prime Minister: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman what people will remember at the next election. They will remember a 33 per cent. rate of tax under a Labour Government and a 24 per cent. rate now. They will notice that interest rates have come down by 8 per cent. and that net disposable income is rising—and they will recall that that is not what happens under Labour Governments.

Mr. Cash: Given the fundamental importance of NATO to Britain and western security and the fact that we are about to send 13,000 British troops to Bosnia, will my right hon. Friend consider vetoing the prospective appointment of Mr. Solana, the Spanish Foreign Minister, as Secretary-General of NATO as he has expressed views against NATO and nuclear deterrence?

The Prime Minister: I understand from the information that I have received that that most certainly is not Mr. Solana's view. I do not know what he may have said in the past and my hon. Friend may have seen quotations of which I am not aware, but it is my understanding that that is not his view on NATO or nuclear weapons.

Q2. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 30 November. [1382]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Campbell: Will the Prime Minister unreservedly condemn the callous actions of Tory-controlled Westminster city council in moving 100 families with 150 babies and children into tower blocks riddled with the most virulent and dangerous form of asbestos? Are there any depths to which his party will not sink in order to hang on to political power?

The Prime Minister: On the subject of depths, the hon. Lady might address her question to the Monklands, Lambeth or Walsall councils, or to any one of many other Labour-controlled councils whose activity in local government is a disgrace.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Did my right hon. Friend read in the Sunday Express the article about the strange goings-on in the Sedgefield constituency, where the Hurworth comprehensive school is applying for grant-maintained status? Is he aware that the Labour party there is accused of campaigning on dirty tricks and misleading information to stop the Leader of the Opposition being embarrassed? If my right hon. Friend had a son at a grant-maintained school, would he feel that his constituents were entitled to the same opportunity?

The Prime Minister: I did not read the article, but if what my hon. Friend said is correct, I am sure that the Opposition would wish to examine the matter, investigate it, condemn what has happened and ensure that such campaigning ceased immediately. Of course people have a right to a ballot on grant-maintained schools. They have a right also to have that ballot without undue hindrance, either from the local authority or from Labour Members. I very much hope that they will have that right.

Q3. Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 30 November. [1383]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Madden: As the Prime Minister is aware of the importance of prisoners in building still further confidence in the Irish peace process, will he support the early transfer, on humanitarian grounds, of Patrick Kelly and Michael O'Brien to prisons in Northern Ireland, and the repatriation of Irish prisoners to prisons in the Irish Republic—I hope before Christmas?

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows that there is the question of the health of one of those prisoners. They have both been convicted, as he knows, of serious terrorist offences. One of the solicitors involved has submitted medical evidence in support of a transfer. That matter, under the normal procedures, is being examined.

Mr. Deva: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, if a member of his Front Bench had made a statement such as was made last night by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) in a public television programme, he would have fired him instantly?

The Prime Minister: I regret any remark that has any connotation of the sort that I believe lies behind my hon. Friend's question. I hope that it is a matter that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) will clear up.

Q4. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 30 November. [1384]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mudie: The Prime Minister will be aware that many Yorkshire households are still facing the prospect of using standpipes and that many businesses are facing rotational water supply cuts. Given the obscene profits that were announced yesterday, will the Prime Minister join me and the people of Yorkshire in condemning the directors of Yorkshire Water both for their greed and for their incompetence?

The Prime Minister: I am pleased to tell the hon. Gentleman that I understand that Yorkshire Water plans to invest £2.5 billion over the next 10 years and that it will invest more than £200 million this year for its customers' benefit. I believe that that is double its half-year profits. I hope that that will go a long way to ensuring that the difficulties that have occurred after years of a nationalised water industry will not be repeated under private ownership.

Q5. Mr. Sims: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 30 November. [1385]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Sims: Is my right hon. Friend aware that thousands of pensioners will welcome the new 20p rate of tax on savings? Is it not clear proof that the Government are working towards a 20 per cent. basic rate, as distinct from the policies that the Labour party is espousing, which mean that it is heading for a 30p rate?

The Prime Minister: Given the demands for extra spending that come from Labour Back-Bench Members, there is no doubt that a 30p rate might be exceeded were there ever to be a Labour Government. My hon. Friend is right; the 20p rate is particularly good news for thousands of people with savings, especially, perhaps, for many hundreds of thousands of pensioners with savings.

I think that it was the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) who said a few days ago, when talking about Labour policy, that these days it amounts to little more than a marketing exercise. We saw that with the gimmick of a 10p tax rate for the allegedly lower-paid. The reality is that we are proceeding towards a lower tax rate of 20 per cent. whereas the Labour party's spending plans add up to substantially more than the current level of taxation, whatever it may care to claim about them.

Mr. Janner: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to look at the awful case of my constituent, Jasmine Sorabjee, aged three and a half, born in this country and ill, whom the Home Office has seen fit to deport to Kenya with her mother? Is not that a cruel, disgraceful decision, devoid of compassion that shows the disgraceful way in which the Government are abusing immigration rules and failing to exercise any compassionate concern in cases of real human suffering?

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman knows that the Government are not bypassing any of the immigration regulations. He knows that that is the case and he really should not have indicated the contrary. There are strict ways in which these matters are examined. They are examined with compassion.

Mr. Janner: They are not.

The Prime Minister: They are examined with compassion. Without any shadow of doubt they are examined with compassion. I have no details of the particular case, but the person removed from this country would have been the parent who, presumably, was an illegal immigrant.

Local Government Finance

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. John Gummer): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the local authority finance settlement for England for 1996-97.

In forming my proposals, I have listened carefully to the views of local authorities and their associations, and I have considered fully the demands which will be placed on local authorities in the coming year.

I have also given weight to the interests of the economy as a whole, and in particular the Government's objective of reducing the public sector deficit. Local government accounts for around a quarter of general Government expenditure and has been rigorously examined, as have all other spending programmes. It is clear that many authorities continue to have scope to increase their efficiency.

I have also taken into account our policy that increases in pay and prices within the public sector must be offset, or more than offset, through efficiency savings or other economies. Within available resources, our approach to public sector pay is flexible enough to allow pay to be set to reflect the circumstances of individual groups.

That is the background to the aggregate figures that I published on 28 November. The Government's view is that the appropriate level of revenue spending for local authorities in England—the total standard spending or TSS—in 1996-97 will be £44.92 billion.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will be making a separate announcement on resources for community care, which are included in the figures that I have just quoted. The figures also reflect the transfer of waste regulation to the Environment Agency from 1 April 1996 and certain other minor changes in local authorities' functions next year, and include provision of £100 million for the transitional costs of local government reorganisation.

The figures do not include resources to compensate local authorities for lost income from community care charges, arising from capital disregard changes announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Tuesday. A special grant report will be laid before the House in due course to authorise an additional grant in 1996-97 for that purpose.

My proposal, including provision for community care, reorganisation costs and the police, provides for a 3.3 per cent. increase in local authority spending year on year. In allocating these resources, we have reduced provision for capital financing to bring it more into line with authorities' need to spend.

The Government have to decide what local government expenditure the nation can afford, because the national taxpayer foots most of the bill. Last year, we decided on £43.5 billion. This year, it is £44.9 billion. Of course, every year some local authorities spend more than under this system. They have their own resources: council tax, interest, fees and charges. So every year, on top of what the Government allow for, they budget to spend more. That is what we all expect. However, every year they use that difference to try to confuse the electorate. They take this year's spending, which includes all their resources, and compare it with the Government's settlement, which, of course, excludes much of their resources. As a result, even though the Government provide for them to spend £1.4 billion more, they claim it as a cut.

I dwelt on that, because the confusion reaches even as far as the House of Commons. It is very important that at least we start by getting the facts straight.

I am comparing—[Interruption.] I am pleased that Labour Members think that, because it will be the first time—for any settlement under the Government—that they have bothered to think about the facts at all. I have to tell the House that the Labour party circulated a note before the Budget statement, saying that, whatever the settlement was, Labour Members had to say that it was inadequate. That shows how interested the Labour party is in the facts.

I am comparing the Government's settlement for last year with that for this year. Last year, local authorities spent more than the settlement, and they will do exactly the same this year.

As for local authority services, we have decided to give the main priority to education. My proposal is that, after adjusting for changes in function, education standard spending should increase by 4.5 per cent. I must emphasise that the amount spent on schools is a decision for the local authority concerned, but no doubt parents, governors and teachers will wish to ensure that the whole of that increased funding feeds through into school budgets.

The provision that I have announced for the transitional costs of local government reorganisation in 1996-97 will need to cover both a further tranche of transitional costs in the areas where reorganisation takes place on 1 April next year, as well as costs where reorganisation is not due to take place until April 1997. Orders have not yet been placed before Parliament to implement all the changes that the Local Government Commission recommended as part of its main county reviews. In addition, we must await the commission's final recommendations on the fresh district reviews; these are due later this year. We envisage a staging of the implementation of reorganisation in England which takes account of the resources available.

Central Government grant and the distributable amount of non-domestic rates in support of TSS will be £35.62 billion, a year-on-year increase of 2.8 per cent. I announced on 28 November that the distributable amount of non-domestic rates in 1996-97 should be £12.74 billion, and I am today publishing the detailed basis for the distribution. I propose that the revenue support grant for distribution should be £18 billion. In addition, some £4.88 billion of specific and special grants would be available. The total of revenue support grant for England, on which I am consulting, may need to be altered slightly if the balance of the police funding formula as between Welsh and English police authorities changes as a result of consultation.

I turn now to the means of distributing revenue support grant. At its heart is the standard spending assessment for each authority.

Standard spending assessments are never likely to be popular, but they must be fair. More SSA for one authority means less for everyone else, because the total is fixed. We are continually discussing with the local authority associations how the SSAs might be improved. I am sure that it would be helpful to the House if the Labour party also discussed that with the local authority associations. They certainly think that they are fair, even though the counties would like more for the counties and the metropolitan authorities would like more for the metropolitan authorities. It is very difficult, when one has an objective system, that the only people who do not think that it is objective are the official Opposition—in this House, but not outside. We share with the local authority associations all the detailed data and analyses that might form the basis of changing the SSA formulae.

The system is as open and objective as we can make it. Those who claim otherwise simply do not understand the SSA system. The formulae we use are not applied selectively to achieve a particular result for a particular authority—[Laughter.] If Opposition Members wish to press me, I will give them figures that will be very embarrassing to them. I shall be happy to show that the authorities about which they complain got more proportionately under Labour Governments than under Conservative Governments—[HON. MEMBERS: "Westminster."]—and one of them is the very authority they mention.

For each local authority service, the same formula is used for every authority that provides that service. If the formula specifies £2,000 per pupil or per kilometre of road, that is what the authority's SSA is.

All the local authority associations understand the need for a SSA system. The differences between them are about the indicators that they believe are important and the ways in which they should be weighted. We have no choice but to assess the strengths of the conflicting arguments when deciding what changes to make.

For 1996-97, we have brought up to date the data on SSA indicators, such as population and pupil numbers, wherever that is possible. It is right that we should reflect changing circumstances.

We propose only limited changes in the method by which we calculate SSAs. Authorities will generally welcome relative stability in their SSAs. We have, therefore, made changes only where we were satisfied that there is a sufficiently strong case for doing so. Most of the changes have been the subject of representations from authorities. The arguments for and against change have been discussed at length with the local authority associations.

There are, therefore, six main changes. We have responded to suggestions that the allowance for special educational needs and support services should be based on the number of pupils attending maintained schools, rather than the total number of children living in an area.

We have responded to requests that we make distinct provision for local authorities' contributions to the cost of rent allowances, over which they have limited discretion. We have also responded to those who wish a distinct element of the SSA to be allocated to authorities that pay the levies of the national parks and the Broads.

We have responded to those who believe that a larger proportion of the SSA for the police should be related to the cost of pensions and a lesser proportion to the police establishment.

We have followed up the Audit Commission's report entitled, "In the Line of Fire", introducing a distinct element in the formula relating to pensions and a new element relating to the work of the fire service on fire prevention and fire safety. And we have brought up to date the basis on which we allow for district councils providing some county council services and vice versa.

One controversial part of the formula in which we have retained the existing methodology is the area cost adjustment. We have agreed with the local authority associations that we will set up an i dependent review, which will report in June 1996. The aim will be to identify a way of calculating the area cost adjustment that is conceptually sound, achieves a wide measure of acceptance among local authorities in all parts of the country and is practical to apply, year by year.

Meanwhile, the area cost adjustment for 1996-97 will reflect the narrowing of differentials in earnings between London and the south-east and the rest of the country. Compared with the adjustment made for 1995-96, SSAs in London and the south-east will be more than £150 million lower, and those in other parts of the country higher by a similar amount, through using the more recent figures on earnings.

I therefore propose that authorities should receive a special grant to damp the effects on council tax of changes in the method of calculating SSAs. I stress that that applies only to changes in the method. Changes in data have their full effect, without being moderated through damping, as is our usual practice.

That means that the change in the area cost adjustment, which I have just mentioned, comes through in full because it arises from changes in the data on earnings. That is even-handed; when the earnings data were changing in a way that was favourable for London and the south-east, London received the full benefit without damping.

The damping grant will operate at a threshold of 2 per cent., taking account both of the change in the SSA and of any damping grant being paid in the previous year as a result of earlier changes in SSAs. In the case of police authorities, the damping arrangements will also take account of the police grant. I know that that will be widely welcomed.

The council tax is now well established as an equitable means whereby local residents contribute to the cost of local services. Council taxes will vary widely, depending on the spending decisions of each local authority and its performance in collecting the tax, on the circumstances of each household, and on individual entitlement to exemptions or benefits.

However, I am required to identify notional taxes for each valuation band, for a standard level of spending—the so-called council tax for standard spending, or CTSS. My proposals incorporate a CTSS for band C of £505. I emphasise to the House that that is merely an element in the grant distribution formula. It is neither a prediction of individual council tax bills nor a national average.

I believe that we have now fully met our commitment to help those facing the largest increases above their community charge bills when the council tax was introduced. I therefore do not propose to continue the scheme of transitional relief in 1996-97. However, I do propose a scheme to protect council tax payers in areas to be reorganised from 1 April 1996 from unacceptably large increases in council tax if those are a direct consequence of reorganisation.

Local authorities need to make a full contribution to the control of public expenditure and to set budgets that their local taxpayers, and the country as a whole, can afford. I am today announcing my intentions for capping criteria.

[Mr. John Gummer]

First, however, I shall draw attention to a technical change in the capping rules. Billing authorities have until now been required to include in their budget requirement, on which capping bites, a proportion of the income forgone in granting certain discretionary non-domestic rate reliefs. I propose to remove those reliefs from the scope of capping. I am sure that billing authorities will welcome that change. Decisions on the granting of relief are entirely for them, but I hope that the change will encourage greater consistency of policy in that area—for example, towards village shops suffering financial difficulties.

I am issuing today proposed notional amounts for authorities whose boundaries or functions will change from 1 April 1996, including the reorganised authorities in Avon, Cleveland, Humberside and North Yorkshire.

In addition, the provisional capping principles make allowance for a number of changes since last year, such as in the funding of rail services in metropolitan areas. That is necessary to allow a fair year-on-year comparison of budgets. Subject to those and other technical adjustments affecting individual authorities, my proposals for capping criteria are as follows.

As in previous years, when authorities set budgets 12.5 per cent. or more above their SSAs, the proposed criteria will not permit any increase over their 1995-96 base budget. However, I do not intend to seek reductions from the few remaining authorities that set budgets substantially above their SSAs.

In this year's settlement we have given priority to the police, to education, to personal social services, including care in the community and to the fire service. I propose to reflect these priorities in changes that I am introducing into the capping system; changes which will allow those authorities that are local education authorities, police, or fire and civil defence authorities, a greater measure of flexibility.

County councils and the Isles of Scilly, new unitary authorities, metropolitan districts, London boroughs, police and metropolitan fire and civil defence authorities will benefit from the new approach. For authorities budgeting up to 12.5 per cent. above their SSA, there will be two capping criteria. The increase in their budgets will be limited to whichever gives the greater increase.

Under the first criterion, the increase in an authority's budget will be limited to an amount calculated by adding together the increases compared with 1995-96 in the authority's SSAs for education, for personal social services, for fire and—in the case of police authorities—the increase in their police SSA and their principal formula police grant. The second criterion will limit an authority to a flat-rate year-on-year increase compared with its 1995-96 base budget.

The second criterion will give permitted increases as follows—for county councils and the new unitary authorities in Avon, Cleveland, Humberside, York, and the Isle of Wight, and for the Isles of Scilly, I propose that the year-on-year increase should be limited to 3 per cent. For metropolitan districts, outer London boroughs and the London and metropolitan fire and civil defence authorities, I propose that the increase should be limited to 2 per cent. For inner London boroughs and the City of London, I propose that the increase should be limited to 1.5 per cent. For police authorities, I propose that the increase should be limited to 3.5 per cent. These percentages will be used if higher than the figures arrived at by adding relevant SSA increases, as I explained earlier.

For shire districts, I propose that the criterion should be the same as last year. That is, any increase of 0.5 per cent. over last year will be considered excessive if it gives a budget requirement above an authority's SSA. These criteria are necessarily provisional, and I cannot take my decisions on capping until authorities have set their budgets. When I come to take those decisions, I shall of course take into account all relevant considerations.

The new approach that I have outlined will allow individual authorities greater flexibility to adapt their budgets to local circumstances. Authorities have repeatedly said that they would use such flexibility in a responsible way, and would not take this as a licence for a general increase in spending and taxes. The Government, and council tax payers, will watch with interest how authorities respond to the greater responsibility that this places upon them. We shall see where their true instincts lie.

Alongside this new approach to capping, the Government are also proposing an expansion of challenge funding in local authorities' capital programmes. Challenge funding is one of the greatest successes of this Government. Earlier this week, the Environment Select Committee reported that the single regeneration budget challenge fund has already demonstrated its potential to achieve excellent value for taxpayers' money. The SRB challenge fund supports the regeneration of cities, towns and smaller communities throughout England. It is also and increasingly promoting genuine community and private sector involvement, integration of different Government programmes and a new sense of partnership between local authorities, training and enterprise councils and others.

The challenge fund is therefore a proven concept, demonstrated by a substantial programme which is making a very noticeable impact. We are already building on it by applying the challenge approach to the housing investment programme and other initiatives, including the new deprived estates challenge fund.

The Government have been enormously encouraged by the imaginative and constructive way in which local authorities have so far seized the opportunities the fund presents. They have found that challenge funding stimulates a new approach to priority setting. Separate service departments come together to co-ordinate an approach which best suits the authority as a whole. The contributions levered in from the private sector enable them to increase the total spend to the benefit of local people, businesses and competitiveness.

We believe that we should build on that progress, and pilot approaches which would accelerate the drive towards challenge funding beyond the relatively small proportion of public spending to which it applies at present. I will therefore publish a discussion document shortly, which will set out options for a pilot scheme for introducing challenge funding for an element of local authority capital programmes. I want to hear from those with further experience of the benefits of challenge funding, and I hope that we will be able to move forward very quickly.

My Department is today writing with the details of the settlement to every local authority in England. That package includes a consultation paper setting out how we propose to distribute central Government support among authorities, including my proposals on SSAs, for continuing to damp SSA losses and for the police authorities. It sets out my provisional capping criteria, illustrates them by calculations of the proposed cap for each authority and includes my proposals for notional amounts. Copies of this package have been placed in the Vote Office and the Library.

The proposals that I have outlined today represent a balanced and reasonable response to the conflict between the pressure to provide ever more resources for local government and the need to control public spending. They provide for a 3.3 per cent. increase in local authority spending, including police and the transitional costs of reorganisation. They incorporate significant improvements in how available resources are allocated, while continuing to protect people in those authorities that stand to lose most from changes in SSA methodology. They would allow council taxes next year to be set at reasonable levels, offering protection from excessive bills. They represent a package which the country as a whole can afford.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Today's statement shows that the Government are determined to force local councils to increase council tax and reduce the services that they provide for local people. Next year, as this year, local people will have to pay more and get less. [Interruption.] Madam Speaker, we kept quiet for 25 minutes. It would not be a bad idea if Conservative Members could keep quiet for five.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. He will be heard in good order.

Mr. Dobson: On the basis of the Government's figures, council taxes could rise by as much as this year's average increase of 5.2 per cent. That council tax increase, combined with higher charges for local services like school meals, meals on wheels and home helps, and the cost of service reductions, will cost an average household £108 next year.

The Government's figures also show that they expect council tax payers to cough up an extra £3.5 billion over the next three years, which is about equal to an extra tuppence on the standard rate of income tax. That is just another example of the Government furtively taking away with one hand the highly publicised cuts that they have been making with the other.

The Secretary of State and the Prime Minister today, like the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Tuesday, claimed that the Government will provide more money for education next year. That is simply not true. According to their own figures, councils will spend less on education next year than they are spending on it this year. An extra 86,000 children will be at school next year. It they are taken into account and councils fall into line with the Government's published spending plans, the amount spent per pupil next year in our schools, far from rising, will fall by £40 per pupil.

Let us compare the Government's world of fantasy finance with what is happening in the real world. In the real world, there are more schoolchildren; hard-working schoolteachers expect a pay increase next year; inflation drives up the price of books and other school equipment; and councils or schools will have to meet the extra costs of measures like installing seat belts in school coaches.

A landfill tax will be levied on councils, costing them £77 million next year. That is a straight transfer from council tax payers to the Treasury. This morning the Secretary of State said on the radio that councils could save more money by putting services out to tender. As he well knew when he said it, councils are already obliged by law to put their services out to tender and, if a contract does not go to the Tories' friends in the private sector, it can be only because a council's own work force put in a lower and better bid. He also suggested that councils can increase charges to help keep up their current level of spending. Which charges does he want to see increased? Does he want parents to have to pay more for school dinners or pensioners to pay more for meals on wheels or home helps?

This mean-minded settlement will increase council taxes, push up charges for vital local services and cut those services for local people. It means that next year, like this year, the Government will force local people to pay more and get less.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is saying, on the one hand, that the settlement is inadequate and on the other that we are putting taxes up to pay for it. The curious thing is that those two ideas do not hang together. How much would he think was adequate? How much more tax would a Labour Government impose to pay for an adequate settlement? They cannot have it both ways. He wants more money without anybody paying it. That is the traditional Labour attitude.

When the hon. Gentleman works out how much the council tax, as he says, will go up, he is saying that every Labour council will put up its tax to the highest level that it can manage within TSS and therefore take that tax off its local taxpayers. In other words, he is proving what we have always said: that Labour councils tax people more, and that immediately they are given the chance to tax more, they take that chance. Yet what did the local authority associations, which are all run by the Labour party, say? They said that if we gave them more freedom they would deal with it responsibly, but Sir Jeremy Beecham has now told us that they will use every corner of that freedom to put up the council tax by 10 per cent.

Already the Labour party has halved that increase to 5 per cent. because it does not accord with the Blair rule, which was circulated around the Opposition Front Bench and was very clear. First, before the Budget was announced, Labour Members had to say that any settlement, whatever it was, was inadequate. Secondly, they could not promise any more money.

The questions of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) beg the question: how can people have more money to spend without any increase in taxation? The answer is that one cannot spend money one does not have. It is a simple answer, but it is one that Labour—new, old or indifferent—has never learned. We have heard today that the Labour party has not learned anything. Wherever it is in power, it intends to spend right up to the limit that it is allowed.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras went on to say that it was fantasy finance. How interesting. The hon. Gentleman was comparing what councils are spending this year with what their allowance from the Government is for next year instead of comparing like with like.

Mr. Dobson: That is not true.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman did. I suggest that he looks at Hansard to see it. He knows that councils will have 4.5 per cent. more, on average, to spend on education and if that money does not get through to the schools, it will be the Labour and Liberal councils that have stopped it. The Government have given 4.5 per cent. to the schools. The only people who can stop it getting there are the Labour party and its local councils.

Lastly, we will be watching carefully the argument about going out to tender. The metropolitan authorities have gone out to tender and in well over 80 per cent. of cases, the in-house team has won but in the shire districts, only 40 per cent. of in-house teams have won. Does that mean that Labour in-house teams in metropolitan authorities are much more efficient than Labour in-house teams in shire districts or does it mean that it is almost impossible to win a contract in a Labour metropolitan district because the local council trade unionists make sure that they are the paymasters and that those local authorities therefore pay them with the council tax payers' money?

Sir David Madel (South-West Bedfordshire): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the difficulty that Bedfordshire county council has had this year in relation to its school budgets. Can he confirm that his announcement will make it perfectly possible for Bedfordshire county council to put more money into school budgets in Bedfordshire next year?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. If Bedfordshire county council does not increase significantly the money going to its schools—it has a permitted budget increase of 3 per cent., and more in terms of its education budget—it will be because the council has pinched the money to spend on something it wants more.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): Will the Secretary of State confirm that if there is to be extra real spending by local councils next year in education and other spheres, which he has tried to pretend there ought to be, that money will have to come from an increase in council tax? According to the Department of the Environment's own figures, which were contained in a press release issued on Tuesday, the Government's central subsidy to local councils will be precisely the same in real terms next year as it is this year. There are no extra real resources from the Government. Moreover, is it not the case that a large proportion of the extra resources come from business rates, which are simply a transfer from businesses to the local community, while the amount coming from other taxation is actually falling considerably?

Mr. Gummer: First, it would be more helpful if the hon. Gentleman, when looking at the Red Book, could distinguish between British figures and English figures; otherwise we do not get the comparison right. His comparison is wrong. Secondly, I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has run a business, but most business men do not start off by saying that the only way to save money is by getting more. They start by asking themselves whether they can be more efficient and then use the money that they save. The Labour party and its annexes, the Liberals, have said the same thing: that the only way that we can find the money is to increase council tax. Sir Jeremy Beecham, who is of course supported on this matter by the Liberals, today let the cat out of the bag. He said that Labour and Liberal councils will spend every penny that the Government allow them to spend. Whether they need it or not, the council tax will increase by 10 per cent., and it will be a Labour and Liberal increase.

Sir Timothy Sainsbury (Hove): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the priority that he has given to education in the form of a 4.5 per cent. increase and the recognition of that in the capping formula will be very widely welcomed? Will he join me in condemning the irresponsible party political scaremongering in which East Sussex county council and a number of others led by Labour and the Liberal Democrats have indulged, frightening parents, teachers and governors by saying that their education budgets are going to be cut instead of increased?

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend is perfectly right. His county council will have an increase of 3 per cent. It has been going around, as my county council has—it has been a nationally run operation—telling people that it would suffer a 5 per cent. cut. If I may use my own county council as an example, in Suffolk there will be an increase of 5.7 per cent. for education. The county council has been scaremongering and saying that there will be a cut of 5 per cent., which shows how the Opposition parties will use anything to try to get party political support.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): On the question of schools and the area cost adjustment, does the Secretary of State intend to continue the distribution of money on the basis that Birmingham should spend 20 per cent. less than Westminster on the education of a child?

Mr. Gummer: The area cost adjustment is something about which we argue with the local authorities. Of course, the hon. Gentleman could have used Tower Hamlets or any other inner London borough as an example because the position is the same for all the inner London boroughs and, indeed, the south-east in general. That is how the system works. There is a real argument between Labour, Conservative and Liberal authorities which get money from the area cost adjustment and the similar authorities which do not get the money. That is why, having tried with their help—they also tried, together and separately—we decided that the only way to proceed is to have an independent inquiry to see whether we can find a better method. But there is a fundamental difference: those who receive from the present system like it and those who do not receive do not like it. The trouble is that even the independent group will find that difficult to square.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the socialist and soggy Liberal councils will almost certainly say that that is not enough money? Does my right hon. Friend realise that anyone who studies the figures will welcome the 4.5 per cent. increase on the SSA for education? Will he encourage recalcitrant county councils such as Warwickshire to release more of their financial assets to which they still cling on in difficult times? Will he tell such councils that they should live within the inflation figure like everyone else has to?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend makes a good point. If local authorities wanted to help people on the basis of inflation—if they tried to push inflation down—which would help them in future years, they would seek to live at least within the inflation figure, if not try to make savings. In my hon. Friend's case—in Warwickshire—there is a permitted increase of budget of 3.2 per cent., which will feed through into education more significantly. The concerns that both he and my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) have pressed on me so often have been met this year by that change and will be met in the future by the agreement for an independent review of the area cost adjustment which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) has often told me, is particularly difficult for Warwickshire.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Secretary of State has made great play of local authorities' ability to pass on the money that he says is being provided for education, presumably by way of the SSA. Does he agree that the SSA does not provide the money, which comes through the revenue support grant? For the past few years, with the best will in the world, Newham has been unable to pay its SSA in education because £6 million had to be spent on the homeless and another large sum had to be spent in respect of capital receipts, which it is impossible to pay out of the revenue support grant provided by the Secretary of State. How can Newham, with an increase of 2.5 per cent. in permitted budget—compared with Westminster's permitted increase of 11 per cent. for next year—afford the increase in the figure for education?

Mr. Gummer: The answer is simple. Newham has been overspending right at the top of the level and Westminster has kept its costs low. According to the independent assessment published in the Independent only a few weeks ago—

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North-West Durham): It is yours.

Mr. Gummer: It is an independent assessment and has nothing to do with me. According to that assessment, Westminster is the fourth most deprived borough in London. [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras will read the Independent newspaper to see where the statistic came from. That newspaper does not support, nor is it written by, my officials. The hon. Gentleman seems to want to discount those independent figures. Is he honestly saying that, in future, if there were ever a Labour Government, he would hand out money on the basis of his own—bottom—ideas? If he does that, he will be returning to the old Labour system which gave Westminster significantly more than the present system.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): As my right hon. Friend has said that the review of district councils is nearly complete, will he promise the House that there will be an early review so that the people of East Cowes can have the parish council to which they have been looking forward? Is he aware that the Liberal Democrat-controlled Isle of Wight council published a leaflet only last week, on the front of which it said that there would be £630 million of Government cuts to local authorities? Will he condemn that and ensure that the money is used for education on the Isle of Wight? We had had an excellent budgetary record on the Isle of Wight—we drive round in our 25-year-old cars and are all over the age of 60—and we now have a local government settlement specifically for the Isle of Wight. I want the good news to get through to the people, not to be gerrymandered and tinkered about with by the wretched Liberal Democrats who want to spend the money, waste it and do anything with it but provide a decent education for the people of the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Gummer: The people of the Isle of Wight have a very good advocate in my hon. Friend. It is a great sadness that they have a Liberal county council, because that county council will, no doubt, having promised the people cuts, want to deliver on that Liberal promise. It will be the only promise that the Liberals ever made that they will deliver on, but that is the one that they will want to deliver on.

I hope that my hon. Friend and local governors and teachers will insist that the Liberal county council on the Isle of Wight passes back money that has been given to it by the Government from the taxpayers, to every school in the Isle of Wight. I am sure that my hon. Friend will ensure that we soon know if it does not.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the Secretary of State comment on the proposal to withdraw large amounts from the SSAs for the operation of the nursery voucher system? Are not the proposals that the Government are considering unfair, in that the withdrawals from SSAs would be on a per pupil basis, whereas the SSA is allocated on a needs basis? Will not that lead to those authorities with relatively little nursery provision having large amounts of SSA and those with a large nursery provision having very little SSA—perhaps even a negative SSA?

Mr. Gummer: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not noticed that the only people to whom that applies are the four volunteer councils, which do not include his local council. He should not be worried at all.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): In thanking my right hon. Friend for concentrating on education, may I ask him whether Staffordshire will have its very significant problems solved? May I also ask him whether he will try to make the whole business of local government finance a little more intelligible to the ordinary man? Is he aware that the doctrine of the Trinity and the Schleswig-Holstein question are positively kindergarten subjects by comparison with:

"B+C+M-O+V, where B, C, M and O and V have the same meaning in subparagraph (1) above"?

Mr. Gummer: The matter is simple for my hon. Friend. His local council will be able to increase its budget by about 3.2 per cent. It should be able to get a significant amount of money through to the schools, and I am sure that he will ensure that it gets that money through to the schools. If the money does not go to the schools, it will be the Labour-controlled Staffordshire county council that will have failed.

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): Does the Secretary of State remember that last year, Nottinghamshire county council predicted a cut of £20 million and was told that it was scaremongering? In the event, it had to make cuts of £22 million. This year, it predicts cuts of £50 million. Even if the council is completely wrong about that and it has to make cuts of only £25 million, it is not scaremongering: it will mean fewer teachers and larger classes.

Mr. Gummer: No, because there are no such cuts. The only way in which the council can produce those cuts is by deciding how much it would like to have spent in the best of all possible worlds, placing that figure before the public and then saying that it is not receiving that full amount and therefore the bit in between is called a cut. That council could ensure that its local schools had more money, and no doubt the hon. Gentleman will ensure that it does.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Will my right hon. Friend drive home the fact that this year, for education in Devon, there is an increase of more than £17 million—10 per cent. more than the average increase of 5.3 per cent.—and that that means that, on a rough calculation, there is more than about £140 per pupil in Devon extra for the Liberal county council to distribute to the schools instead of keeping it, as the council did last year, to distribute elsewhere? Will he therefore consider whether certain councils should have the SSA ring-fenced to ensure that they get the money to the schools rather than keeping it for the county?

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend is right. He will notice that Liberal Members are busy trying to pretend that that money is not coming to them, because Liberals want to do again this year what they did last year, which was to starve the schools in order to blame the Government and to use the money for something else.

We know how the Liberals operate. They will no doubt try to operate in that way again this time, but, with a settlement of more than 5 per cent., as my right hon. Friend says, if that money does not get to every school in Devon, I am sure that he in his constituency and his colleagues in other constituencies will ensure that every parent and governor knows that the reason why the money has not got there is the Liberals at Devon county hall.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does the Secretary of State accept that increasing the standard spending assessment for education by 4.5 per cent. does not give local authorities a penny more because Lancashire county council, for example, is already spending 108 per cent. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman said in the early part of his statement that the real increase in local government expenditure was only 2.8 per cent. Is that not the crux of the issue?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must face the fact that Lancashire county council can increase its budget by 3.2 per cent. By concentrating on education, which represents a significant part of its budget, the council can significantly raise the amount spent on schools. The hon. Gentleman knows that; any attempt by him to suggest otherwise demonstrates that he is in league with Lancashire county council—one of the least satisfactory county councils in the country—in trying to excuse the fact that the council has not given the money to the schools. We shall wait and see. If the council does not give the money to the schools, we shall know who to blame—and the hon. Gentleman will be one of them.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My right hon. Friend will be aware that I have frequently questioned Ministers on the Floor of the House about the allocation of resources to Cheshire—my constituency is in that county—especially in relation to personal social services and education. May I thank my right hon. Friend for the additional allowance of 5.1 per cent. for education—that is more than £17 million—and for the additional sum of £1.25 million for personal social services? I know that that will be welcomed by those who run Cheshire county council, and by my constituents.

Will my right hon. Friend clarify one point, however? The Minister of State has launched an inquiry into the area cost adjustment. When the committee or commission that conducts that inquiry has reported, will its recommendations be implemented without delay? If Cheshire is to benefit, will the adjustment be implemented retrospectively to cover the current year, or will it apply only to the next financial year?

Mr. Gummer: I thank my hon. Friend for his supportive words, but I should have known that there would be a sting in the tail. I fear that the adjustment will not be retrospective; but I promise that as soon as we have the report and are able to consider it, we shall seek to implement its recommendations as far as is possible, certainly in the next financial year. We are talking not about this year, but about the next settlement. This is the last settlement under the present system, given that the recommendations stand up and are different from the current arrangements.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): Is it not rather misleading to concentrate on the increase in the education part of the revenue support grant? It is only one element in a larger single sum. What percentage change in the non-education element does the right hon. Gentleman propose?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that the hon. Gentleman has noticed that I have used the increase in the total budget in all the figures that I have given. Some hon. Members have referred to education, but I have given the total sum. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the increase in spending permitted in Newham will be more than 2 per cent.

Sir Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I am pleased to learn that Hillingdon's education SSA is to increase by £4,865,000, or 5.5 per cent., in the coming year. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that nothing in the capping arrangements which have existed in the past, and which have been revived this year, will prevent Hillingdon borough council from passing the money on, particularly to grant-maintained schools in my area?

May I also express my gratitude, on behalf of the Uxbridge police, for the element in the statement relating to pensions? That is a great improvement, which will be welcomed by the Uxbridge police.

Mr. Gummer: I thank my hon. Friend for his second point, and I can give him the assurance that he requires on the first.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): Will the Secretary of State drop the smokescreen with which he has been trying to obscure the facts, and answer a simple question? Given the same level of service next year as this, does not the settlement impose a 5.2 per cent. tax increase? Is this not another Tory hidden tax—and not very well hidden at that?

Mr. Gummer: Only if every council decides to spend to the full increase in the SSA and nobody makes any savings whatever. In other words, Labour councils will no doubt force this upon their electorates, but sensibly run councils can make savings and start there. The hon. Gentleman is right only if he assumes a badly run Labour council.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the extra resources that he has announced for education are extremely welcome? What can be done to ring-fence that money to ensure that it actually reaches the schools? Will my right hon. Friend ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to publish a list showing each school in each constituency and how much their budgets would increase if the SSA percentage were passed on to them?

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is here and will have heard my hon. Friend's comment. In his county, we will not have much difficulty in ensuring that the money goes to the schools, because he has a well-run council that seeks always to find savings in order to improve what it can do with education. Elsewhere, we will have to keep a beady eye on what happens.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Does the Secretary of State accept that he cannot claim to be increasing the amount available for education when he is screwing down the overall level of support for local authorities in the way implied by his statement? Is he aware that every £1 million not allowed to Birmingham threatens 200,000 hours of home care; or four libraries and four community centres; or four elderly persons homes; or 100 places in special schools? Which would he cut—or would he put taxes up?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. On the one hand, he complains about the settlement by saying that unless we can make savings, we might have to increase council tax. On the other hand, he says that he wants to spend more. The hon. Gentleman must answer the question that Opposition Front Benchers have not answered: if there were a Labour Government, by how much more would they put up taxes in order to make the settlement what they would call adequate? They will not answer that question because they have been told to say both that the settlement is inadequate, and that they would not increase taxes in order to meet the inadequacy.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): May I add my thanks to those already extended by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Sir T. Sainsbury) for the amount made available to East Sussex?

I wish to ask my right hon. Friend about manners in local government. How can he stop local government carrying on the sort of pseudo-consultation exercise that East Sussex county council has performed on the basis of an anticipated increase in education funding of 0.5 per cent., which was ludicrous months ago and has been proved absolutely ludicrous today?

Mr. Gummer: Although the rough and tumble of party politics is perfectly reasonable and most of us rather enjoy it, I think it is intolerable to frighten parents about the future of their children and old people about their future in council homes. That is part and parcel of most Liberal party politics. The Liberal party is the only party that stoops so low, and I exclude the Labour party from that.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): The Secretary of State has recognised that the change in capital disregards for people in long-term care will have a substantial effect on finances in local government, as we will hear later. Can he guarantee that the disregards will be taken into account for the capping criteria; and that the funds will be adequate? If the funds are inadequate, the Secretary of State will be responsible for the impact on services. What steps has he taken to mitigate the impact?

Mr. Gummer: There have been full discussions on this matter. The announcement and details will be given very soon. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can contain himself till then. If he has further questions, I will be happy to meet him and discuss them.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Surrey county council has not waited for today's announcement and has been busy telling parents in my constituency that schools in Surrey are likely to receive £8 million less next year? Now that he has announced that the schools will receive £8 million more, how does he rate my chances of an apology from Liberal and Labour councillors?

Mr. Gummer: The chance of getting an apology is poor. Perhaps my hon. Friend should ask his Liberal and Labour opponents to use the same mechanism to circulate to every parent and every school the fact they are getting £8 million more. If they did that, they would not need to apologise, but they might have to explain to parents why they tried to mislead them in the first place.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): Will the Secretary of State consult parents about the settlement? What will he say to parents in Nottinghamshire when they bring to his attention the fact that the county council currently spends 7.5 per cent. or £25 million above the Government guideline on education? The county council will receive, at best, £15 million from the settlement, leaving a budget gap of £10 million. There will be bigger class sizes and fewer teachers, so people will be paying more and getting less. How will he respond to them?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has to say that 3.3 per cent. goes on in addition—it goes straight through. However, he should point out to the leader of his county council that Nottinghamshire is one of the most profligate counties in the country and could give a great deal more to schools if it stopped spending as wildly as it does now.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): Does my right hon. Friend recall our conversation in a similar debate last year, when he admitted that the methodology of the SSA calculation was unfair to Solihull council? Does he now believe that he has corrected that in his statement today?

Mr. Gummer: I am pleased that my hon. Friend reminds me of that occasion, which was not a comfortable one for me because I had real sympathy with Solihull. As he knows, I cannot change individual arrangements as they are made by classes. Solihull is one of a class and the arrangements last year had a particular effect on

[Mr. Gummer]

Solihull. He will note that the budget can rise by 3 per cent. I have announced an independent inquiry into the way in which we deal with the area cost adjustment, which is particularly important to Solihull. I hope that when it comes through, my hon. Friend will be happier about the arrangements.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. Despite the fact that the statement has now taken more than a hour, I shall try to call all the Conservative Members who have been standing for so long. Perhaps we can have a reasonably quick exchange as there are two more statements.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Would it not be fraudulent of local authorities to use the money directly allocated for schools for some other purpose? Bearing in mind the fact that schools in Nottinghamshire were seriously underfunded last year, surely we should take steps to ensure that the money specifically allocated to schools goes to schools. It is not enough to say that it must be left to parents, governors and local Members of Parliament. We should take a closer interest in ensuring that the money goes to the right quarter.

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and I will certainly take a very close interest, but there is a difficulty. If one believes in local accountability, local councils must make such decisions for themselves. When I refer to governors, parents and local Members of Parliament, I am talking about local accountability. We have told people quite clearly that they can spend significantly more money on schools. Nottinghamshire can save money in many other ways and spend it on schools, but Nottinghamshire taxpayers will have to press to make sure that the money gets through to the schools. If my hon. Friend knows of any case in which they are not doing so, I shall look at it myself.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Although I warmly welcome the increase of the education SSA by 4.5 per cent. this year, which is generous, has it ever crossed the mind of my right hon. Friend when he was Minister for Local Government or now, as Secretary of State, that the two main weaknesses of the system that we are discussing are its excessive complexity and centralisation? Is it not time that the Government took a long, hard look at those aspects, particularly if my right hon. Friend is sincere—as I presume him to be—in saying that he favours local accountability? Is not the real answer to give local authorities more possibility to take their own spending decisions and then to be held directly to account by their local electorates?

Mr. Gummer: I have great sympathy with what my hon. Friend says, but there are two problems. First, if local authorities are spending a quarter of the spending of government as a whole, it must have an effect on the ability of national Government to spend. If local authorities were to push up spending, we, national Government, would have to reduce our spending on the national health service, for example, to keep the general economy in shape. There is a real difficulty.

Secondly, money does not necessarily come easily from a local community in the sense that the poorest communities may have the greatest needs but the lowest rate bases. We need a system that provides a real redistribution of income, which is what the SSA does. There will always be a significant amount of central Government spending, over which we need to have some control. A modest movement, however, in the direction of more money coming from the local community, would be reasonable. In that context I have gone some way towards the Labour party. Its latest policy document, entitled "Renewing Democracy", states that "it would be far healthier for democracy if councils were responsible for raising locally a much higher proportion of the money they invest and spend".

I am interested that Labour Members are prepared to attack any move to increase council tax when they want a "much higher proportion" and we are suggesting a small proportion.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Has my right hon. Friend taken account of Labour councils such as Ealing, which have substantial reserves from previous Conservative administrations? Will he be pressing for those reserves to be used where that is needed? Does my right hon. Friend agree that following the education settlement for Ealing it will be indefensible for the council to continue its policy of refusing a travel grant to children who wish to travel to schools some way away from home, even if their parents are on income support, on the ground that they could choose a nearer school? Parents have a right not to do so under current legislation.

Mr. Gummer: I must declare an interest. One of my children attends the local Church school in Ealing. The education provided by that school is very good. I have noticed, however, since Ealing borough council changed hands, that a series of petty and vindictive steps has been taken by the new council, including a step to which my hon. Friend has referred. The council does not like the possibility of parents choosing. I hope that my hon. Friend will join me and other parents to ensure that the money that is provided for Ealing gets through to the schools.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Does my right hon. Friend remember a time when a 4.5 per cent. increase in education SSA would have been welcomed throughout the House? My right hon. and hon. Friends have done even better for Essex, where there will be an increase of 4.9 per cent. That will be worth nearly £26 million, a sum that is larger than some district councils' total budgets. Does my right hon. Friend agree that some of the alibis that we have heard this afternoon—it has been suggested that there will be no increases—will not wash with parents and head teachers? The councils that do not pass on the extra funding will be rightly brought to retribution.

Mr. Gummer: It is important for my hon. Friend to ensure that every head teacher, governor and parent in Essex realises that there will be a 4.9 per cent. increase in the funding that should be available for their schools. Essex county council, like Suffolk county council, sought to frighten people by talking about a 5 per cent. decrease. Against that background, Essex county council owes it to parents to write, "Sorry, the figure was not minus 5 per cent. but plus 4.9 per cent.", and to ensure that every penny of the increased funding gets through to schools.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Does my right hon. Friend recall that last year the Liberal-dominated Gloucestershire county council cut individual school budgets by between 4 and 7 per cent. Will he confirm that this year's figures will allow that council to set a council tax, if it wishes to, which will provide for a generous 5.3 per cent. increase in funding for education? Would not every parent, governor and teacher be able to regard it as a scandal if the county council did not substantially increase individual school budgets?

Mr. Gummer: It will be a scandal if school budgets do not increase in that way in Gloucestershire. It will not be a surprise, however, if that does not happen. Liberals in Gloucestershire have shown themselves willing to play party politics with children's education. They have done it in Gloucestershire and elsewhere. I know of nothing in the past that has been like that. I am sorry that the Liberals should have lowered themselves to that level.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I thank my right hon. Friend for the care that he has given to education in Kingston upon Thames. I reassure him that I will support any measure which ensures that the £1.25 million extra spending for schools in Kingston goes to schools and is not milked off by the local authority.

On a separate issue, will my right hon. Friend use the greatest caution in relation to the area cost adjustment as it affects London? Although my right hon. Friend represents a constituency elsewhere, he lives in London, so he will know that London is more expensive simply because of the number of tourists, the greater use of the roads, the increased use of the city because of the railway stations and the airports, and the increased cost of care for the elderly.

Mr. Gummer: As a Minister, I live in London during the week, but at the weekends and when Parliament is not sitting, I live in the country, so I am entirely independent on the matter. I can see both sides of the case, which have been adequately presented in the House. That is why I have decided that there should be an independent inquiry, which will no doubt look carefully at the points raised by my hon. Friend. However, it will also have to consider my county's concerns regarding sparsity, distance and the difficulty of paying for small schools which are necessary if adequate and proper education is to be provided for small communities. I cannot say that the argument is all on one side. That is why the argument is so difficult to get straight and that is why we have asked for an independent inquiry.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): My right hon. Friend will know that the Minister of State, Home Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), has sent round a letter putting in layman's terms what the increases could mean to police authorities—for example, 66 additional officers for Dorset and a total increase of 6.2 per cent. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that his other ministerial colleagues do something similar, particularly with regard to education? Last year, when it came to ensuring that schools were adequately staffed, Dorset county council said that it was £5 million short, yet we have now discovered from the auditor that the county filched £10 million that it did not need to spend.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend points to the generality. One could understand that being accidental if it occurred in one council, but when it occurs in almost every Labour or Labour-Liberal-controlled council, one has to recognise that there is a concerted effort, which goes as follows. People are frightened by the prospect of a cut which will not come; the council gets an increase but says that there has been a cut, and then the money is put into something else. In my county, money for schools has been put into road signs and red lines across roads. I hope that this time the county will ensure that every penny goes to the schools.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): People in Kent will be delighted to know that the Government are putting an additional 4 per cent. of funding into the county and into its schools. They will also be more than a little relieved because they were led to believe by a document produced with council tax payers' money that there would be no additional money for inflation or pay awards. Bearing in mind the fact that the schools were short-changed last year, what are the prospects for that money finding its way to the Kent schools?

Mr. Gummer: There is no doubt that Kent schools will be able to cover reasonably expected increases in expenditure and probably something rather better than that. But if Kent county council was more concerned about its priorities and spent its money in the schools, it could do even better. But I fear that we may have to wait for Kent county council to cease to be run by the alliance and return to sensible Conservative control.

Mr. Dobson: Rather than have a rant, which is the Secretary of State's usual response to questions from Opposition Members, will he simply confirm that none of the figures quoted by Conservative Members with regard to funds for education makes any allowance for the 86,000 increase in the number of school pupils, the expected pay increases, the expected level of inflation or the additional legal duties which the House has placed on local education authorities?

Mr. Gummer: Some of the money that has been given to the local authorities and some of their added spending will obviously have to cover their additions during the coming year, which is what always happens. But if this is an inadequate settlement, the hon. Gentleman might like the opportunity to say publicly how much would be an adequate settlement, and from where the money would come. The hon. Gentleman is incredible in the House.

Welsh Grand Committee

4.44 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. William Hague): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the future proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee. I have a number of proposals to make, which I hope will ensure that Welsh concerns are debated effectively in the House and which will bring the business of Parliament more effectively to Wales. With that in mind, I am proposing to seek to amend Standing Orders so as to extend and enhance the role of the Welsh Grand Committee.

The Welsh Grand Committee has for many years provided the House with a mechanism by which Members can give detailed consideration to matters relating exclusively to Wales. It is a mechanism which, in recent Sessions, has been relatively little used. In the past three years, there have been only eight meetings of the Committee, even though they have generally been held whenever requested.

I wish to change that disappointing picture. The Welsh Grand Committee has the potential to bring the business of the House to the attention of the people of Wales, and provide a more useful forum for discussion than at present.

First, I wish to introduce Question Time proceedings to the Committee. Interest in Welsh questions is considerable. On every occasion, there are many questions that cannot be reached, and I want to extend the opportunities for oral questions, to the Welsh Grand Committee.

I am therefore proposing that the Committee's Standing Orders should provide for an additional Question Time at some meetings, on dates to be specified in advance with the agreement of the House.

The normal arrangements for giving notice of questions would apply. Each member of the Committee would be able to table one question for answer on a specified day, and 10 sitting days' notice would be required. Questions will be taken at the beginning of sittings of the Committee, and could last for up to 30 minutes. Replies to questions not reached would be printed in the Official Report.

I hope that Members on both sides of the House will welcome this additional opportunity to put questions directly to me and my colleagues about the conduct of the Government's business in Wales, and appreciate that that will significantly increase their ability to raise issues of immediate concern.

I would like the Committee to be able to consider issues of current topical concern in more depth than is possible at present on the Floor of the House. I am therefore also proposing that the Committee will be able to hold short debates to allow more detailed consideration of a smaller number of specific questions.

Each member of the Committee will be able to give notice of a subject to be raised in a short debate on a specified day, with 10 days' sitting notice required. Proceedings on short debates will be allowed to continue for 30 minutes, which should be sufficient time to allow two or three subjects to be raised on each occasion.

In addition, and because I am aware that Members may from time to time wish to raise matters of particular concern to their constituents, I am proposing that in future the Welsh Grand Committee should be able to hold Adjournment debates on matters raised by Members, at the end of the Committee's normal business.

I am also proposing that in future any Minister in the House, whether or not he or she is a Minister for Wales, may take part in debates in the Welsh Grand Committee, enabling them to participate fully in discussion of matters relating to their United Kingdom responsibilities. Any Minister, whether or not he or she is a Member of the House, would also be able to make a statement and to answer questions arising from that statement.

That would represent a very significant and beneficial change in the Committee's procedures. It would enable Members representing constituencies in Wales to listen to and question a Minister with UK or Great Britain responsibilities that affect Wales. It will give the Welsh Grand Committee the scope to examine all aspects of Government policies affecting Wales, and not only on matters that are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales. It will give Welsh Members a further opportunity to debate Welsh affairs while benefiting from their role in a United Kingdom Parliament.

I am pleased to be able to tell the House that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer have both said that they will be prepared to attend a meeting of the Committee if the amendments to Standing Orders are approved by the House.

All those changes will, of course, be in addition to the Committee's existing provisions, and the emphasis will still be on broad-ranging debates on issues of general concern about policy in Wales. Wales does not have a separate legal framework and I am therefore not proposing an additional legislative role for the Committee. I propose that there should be a minimum of four meetings of the Committee each year and that they should be timetabled in advance, allowing notice for the tabling of questions and subjects for short debates. In addition, I would expect it to meet on at least a further two or three occasions, as business permits and issues arise.

To date, two meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee have been held in Cardiff. I want to see it meet more frequently in Wales, and not just in the capital city. It is important to give people in other towns and cities the opportunity to witness the Committee's debates and thus to recognise that the business of the House and of the Committee is intimately concerned with the impact of Government policy on people in all parts of Wales. I appreciate that meetings outside the House place special demands on the House authorities, and officials at the Welsh Office will be ready to offer whatever assistance may be needed in establishing meetings of the Committee in suitable venues across Wales. I would envisage half the timetabled sessions of the Committee taking place in Wales each year, and up to half the additional meetings.

The new Standing Orders will be brought forward for approval shortly. Should the House agree them, I would expect soon thereafter to table a motion setting out a timetable for the rest of this Session.

I hope that the House will welcome my proposals to give the Welsh Grand Committee a more prominent and visible role in the consideration of matters relating to Wales. My proposals will greatly enhance the ability of Members to raise constituency matters and other issues in Parliament. They will help to ensure that discussion of Welsh business is made more accessible to the people of Wales and that our procedures better reflect the Welsh dimension.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): The statement holds out the tantalising prospect of the Prime Minister addressing a meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee at Machynlleth, talking about the efficacy of the hill livestock compensatory allowance. It really would be an interesting experiment.

The statement itself is a welcome admission by the Secretary of State of the inadequacies of the current arrangements for the exercise of democracy in Welsh affairs. The greatest need, of course, is for the representatives of the Welsh people to control our own devolved affairs in Wales, in our own directly elected assembly. That is and will remain our priority, and no amount of tinkering with the existing procedures will divert us from that.

Does not the Secretary of State understand that the only meaningful change, short of devolution, would be to allow the Welsh Grand Committee to take decisions or to influence policy? Without such policies, the Welsh Grand Committee is and will continue to be nothing more than a talking shop. In his statement, the Secretary of State criticised the existing arrangements for being ineffective. Does he not realise that the House of Commons Standing Orders already allow for great discretion to be exercised by the Committee? It does not require to be given, as he suggested, an additional legislative role. It already has one, specified in Standing Order No. 98. The trouble is that the Government have always prevented the Committee from exercising those powers on, for example, local government reform or the Welsh language Act, by suspending Standing Order No. 86.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that the only reason why he is not prepared to allow the Welsh Grand Committee a real role is that he realises how hostile the opinion of Welsh Members of Parliament is to the record of cuts, unemployment, social divisions and abuse of power, which are his Government's hallmarks? Nothing illuminated that better than yesterday's meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee, where he was forcibly reminded of the virtually unanimous opposition in Wales to the introduction of the nursery voucher scheme. Will he now acknowledge the weight of opinion that was expressed at that Committee and drop that petty and divisive scheme, if only as a sign that he is sensitive to the majority of Welsh opinion? Does he not realise that failure to do that would make a mockery of his pious statements about reforming and improving democracy in Wales?

We in the Labour party certainly want to see improvements. Will the Secretary of State confirm that he has received, through the usual channels, our own radical and constructive proposals for change? I also remind him that without the co-operation of Opposition Members, the Committee would not function, so I ask him now for his confirmation that the details of any changes will be implemented only after agreement has been reached via the usual channels.

The prospect of Ministers coming to introduce themselves to the people of Wales via sittings of the Welsh Grand Committee is a novel one and, presumably, is part of the strategy for the Conservative party rather than for the better government of our country. As the Prime Minister has never visited Wales as Prime Minister, except to fulfil the occasional party political engagement, will the Secretary of State confirm that the most appropriate subject for any debate involving the Prime Minister is the failure of the Conservative party to deliver economic prosperity, social cohesion and democratic government to Wales?

The Secretary of State's proposals are modest, but provided he is prepared to work with all the Opposition parties on the Committee, they can be made to work to bring about improvements in the way in which the House conducts its business. However, that will be for a short and experimental period only. These changes, if accepted, must and will be superseded by more far-reaching democratic reforms when the right hon. Gentleman's discredited Government are finally removed from office.

Mr. Hague: It is ironic that the hon. Gentleman should refer to talking shops when he wishes to set up an assembly in Wales that would be a highly expensive talking shop. It would be expensive to the taxpayer and damaging to jobs and investment in Wales, and it would diminish the role of the United Kingdom Parliament in Welsh affairs, whereas what we seek to do today is to enhance the role of the United Kingdom Parliament in Welsh affairs.

It is surprising that the hon. Gentleman describes my proposals as modest, as they go further than the proposals that he tabled two weeks ago, which, as he said, he communicated through the usual channels and which were published for public consideration in newspapers in Wales. My proposals go further: in involving Ministers with UK responsibilities, in bringing the work of Parliament closer to people in Wales, and in holding meetings of the Committee in different locations in Wales. None of those was contained in the proposals that he tabled two weeks ago. Nor was there any proposal about legislative consideration, to which he refers as the only meaningful change. I know about the provision in the Standing Order to which he referred. That is why I said in my statement that there would be no additional legislative role for the Grand Committee.

There is no question but that my proposals go further than those of the hon. Gentleman. I look forward to discussions about the proposals and am open to every idea and suggestion about developing them further, but the eventual decision about changes to Standing Orders is one for the House as a whole to take.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Will the Secretary of State assure the House that he has no intention of amending Standing Order No. 98, which gives the Welsh Grand Committee the right in certain circumstances to consider Bills that are referred to it, in other words, to have a legislative role? If he has no intention of repealing Standing Order No. 98, will he explain why he made no mention in his paltry, miserable statement of referring any legislation to the Welsh Grand Committee under Standing Order No. 98, and explain why the Government are so frightened of using it that we were not even allowed to consider the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 when it was presented by the Government to the House? Will he give us one example of a measure about Wales on which he is prepared to give those who are elected to be legislators for, among other places, Wales, the right to legislate for the country that we represent?

Mr. Hague: I do intend that we should amend Standing Order No. 98, but not in the way that the hon. and learned

[Mr. Hague]

Gentleman fears; I have no intention of removing the provision to which he referred. But he will also know that Wales does not have the separate legal framework that exists in Scotland and that has enabled the Scottish Grand Committee to discuss particular measures. We are talking about something in a quite different context, and no specific Welsh legislation is coming before the House in the current Session. I can reassure him, however, that I have no intention of proposing the sort of change in the Standing Order to which he referred and which he would oppose.

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): Does my right hon. Friend agree that his proposals to hold meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee in different parts of Wales will add locally to the interest and activities of the Committee and, indeed, the proceedings of the House in general?

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The proposal was not put forward by Opposition Members, but I hope that they will welcome it. It is a procedure used by the Scottish Grand Committee and it has been well received in Scotland. There is no reason why people in Wales should not have the same opportunity to see their Grand Committee at work, and it will be widely welcomed throughout Wales.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Does not the Secretary of State realise that, for the past 16 years, the Welsh people have seen the Welsh Grand Committee at work and they look on this proposal as yet another meaningless sop to the true aspirations of the Welsh people? But then, of course, we have seen a succession of Secretaries of State for Wales who do not represent Welsh constituencies or understand the Welsh people, and whose party will never represent the people of Wales. Does not the right hon. Gentleman understand that the real aspirations of the people of Wales are for a Welsh Assembly, with devolution and proper control over their own affairs, not the useless suggestion that he has made yet again today?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Lady will recall that those 16 years began with an emphatic rejection by people in Wales of the idea of such an assembly. I do not think that it is meaningless for the hon. Lady, under these proposals, to have additional opportunities to put questions to Welsh Ministers, raise Adjournment debates and have short debates about matters of constituency concern. Those are not meaningless matters—they are enhancing the ability of Welsh Members of Parliament to represent their constituents and to bring matters before the House of Commons. That is a long way from being a meaningless proposal.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): In terms of the United Kingdom constitution, will my right hon. Friend confirm that having the Prime Minister and senior members of the Cabinet travel to Wales to meetings of the Grand Committee is a constitutional novelty? Rather than call it a talking shop, would it not be more appropriate to call it a listening channel?

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend is right. It is a novelty and it will happen in Scotland and Wales. It will be a popular procedure, it will be widely appreciated and it will enable my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to point to the many successes of Government policy and the improving situation in so many aspects of the Welsh economy, to which Opposition Members are always determined not to refer.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Although he was a youngster at the time, the Secretary of State may recall that in 1979, after the referendum, the incoming Conservative Secretary of State, Lord Crickhowell, said that he would consult about various proposals, including a forum for Wales. It was assumed at the time that specific legislative proposals—institutional proposals—would follow. Sixteen years have passed; this is it. If it is a revamped talking shop, it is a peripatetic talking shop. Surely it will go down in the "Guinness Book of Records" as the longest recorded gestation period of a mouse.

Mr. Hague: What we are seeing is a genuine attempt to improve the workings of the Welsh Grand Committee. At present, its workings are not regarded as satisfactory by people on either side of the House or any party in it. We shall be able to make the proceedings of the Committee more meaningful and more topical, and to ensure that a greater variety of matters can be raised and that particular constituency matters can be raised. Those are proposals that deserve a warm welcome in the House.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that those changes in the Standing Orders of the Welsh Grand Committee mean that more subjects can be raised—indeed, all subjects to do with the United Kingdom? Perhaps more importantly, can he contrast the cost of that sort of Welsh Grand Committee with that of a directly elected Parliament, which would have no more powers than the Committee would have anyway?

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend is right. A far greater range of topics can be raised, and they can be raised by Welsh Members of Parliament in their role as Members of Parliament in this House in the United Kingdom Parliament. Such proceedings will have an additional cost, but the cost of having a completely separate assembly for no obvious purpose would be vastly greater. The direct costs to the taxpayer would be vastly greater, as well as the costs to the Welsh economy in lost inward investment and jobs, from the people who would be frightened away by the prospect of a fracturing of the United Kingdom—or the Balkanisation of the United Kingdom, as one Opposition Member referred to it not long ago.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Even in these modest proposals, is it not an assumption that there are distinctive policies that should be followed in Wales for the needs of Wales? If, as a result of all his listening, the Secretary of State finds out, for example, that nursery vouchers have no support in Wales, will he be willing to change the policy?

Mr. Hague: Of course, there is often a need for distinctive policies in Wales. I and my predecessors have pursued distinctive policies, which are different from policies for England in several respects. The Welsh Grand Committee is an additional forum for discussing what those differences should be.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): The Secretary of State's proposals are to be welcomed in the spirit that any change is bound to be preferable to what we have at the moment. In pursuit of his greater topicality, why is he introducing a system in which, unlike on the Floor of the House where questions can be tabled two days before, he will require 10 sitting days' notice, which is two calendar weeks?

In addition to the minimum four meetings that the right hon. Gentleman specified, will he consider the possibility of another four, to consider the reports of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, which are never debated? Finally, since he refuses to let the Committee have any legislative functions, does he recognise that, although legislation is not separate for Wales in most instances, there are Welsh dimensions, so the Welsh Grand Committee could provide a useful function as a Special Standing Committee? We could hear evidence from experts and others on the Welsh aspects prior to dealing with legislation on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Hague: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his constructive welcome for the proposals. On oral questions, the rule would be the same as it is on the Floor of the House, that is, 10 days' notice of an oral question. Written questions can, in any case, be submitted for answer in two days or more and the proposal will not interfere with that procedure. I envisage that there would be scope for supplementary questions at the meetings and not merely for the questions tabled on the Order Paper.

As to the other subjects that could be debated, for instance the Select Committee reports, there need be no restrictions, as there are no restrictions now, on the subjects that the Committee could discuss. That would be for discussion between the usual channels. Of course, members of the Grand Committee must have a say in what the business of that Committee should be. I envisage that the two, three or more meetings that will be additional to the four timetabled meetings would be used to discuss some of the matters to which the right hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): Is not the Secretary of State aware that this timid little mouse of a statement is totally irrelevant to the needs of the people of Wales? He needs to address his mind to the enormous democratic deficit in our country, given that he is a member of a Government who have been rejected four times since 1979. Is not it right that the people of Wales, far from wanting a tarted-up talking shop like his proposal, are looking forward to the day when they can have a real Parliament in which real decisions are taken—a Parliament with legislative powers that will respond to the wishes of the people of Wales, not those of a Conservative Government who have been rejected by them?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman and I have an obvious difference of view: I believe in the United Kingdom and he does not. I believe that the Government of the United Kingdom are elected by the people of England, of Scotland, of Wales and of Northern Ireland, and that that should continue to be the position. I do not think that we shall be able to reconcile that fundamental difference of view, but I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman could have found it in himself to give a stronger welcome for what will be a distinctive improvement in the workings of Parliament for Welsh Members. They will be able to raise a wider range of issues and more constituency issues, and will be able to question Welsh Office Ministers and debate with other Ministers more often.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Has the Secretary of State noticed what happened on the two most recent occasions on which public opinion in Wales was measured? Conservatives managed to win 4 per cent. of the council seats, and at the Islwyn by-election they secured 3.9 per cent. of the total vote, narrowly beating the Natural Law yogic flyers and Lord Sutch's Loony party. Now that the Conservatives have established themselves as the prime loony party in Wales, how can they claim the right to dominate Welsh legislation—legislation that affects Wales alone? When 85 per cent. of Welsh Members signed amendments to Bills on the Welsh language and on Welsh local government, their opinions were swept aside by the dominance of Members from other parts of the United Kingdom, whose constituents were not affected in any way by the legislation. Is not that a travesty of democracy?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman knows that we all live and work in a United Kingdom Parliament. If he does not believe in a United Kingdom Parliament—and that is the implication of what he is saying—he had better say so.

Mr. Flynn indicated dissent.

Mr. Hague: I think that the hon. Gentleman does not believe in a United Kingdom Parliament; we have got that clear, because he is shaking his head. Those of us who believe in a United Kingdom Parliament—I happen to think that the great majority of the people of Wales believe in one—should be concentrating on ensuring that that Parliament works well. My proposals will ensure that it works better for Welsh affairs.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): Surely the announcement is a panic reaction to the overwhelming support for Labour's policy for an elected assembly in Wales. [Laughter.] Yes it is. Why does not the Secretary of State admit that he is adopting the same old English establishment approach to demands for constitutional reform? We have seen that reaction over votes for working-class citizens and over votes for women. First, people deride such demands as loony. Then, when the pressure keeps coming, they resist forcibly. Then they try to buy the protesters off, which is what this pathetic proposal is about. Finally they cave in, and when they have done so, nobody ever admits to having opposed the demands in the first place. Why does not the Secretary of State short-circuit that miserable process and grant the Welsh people's demand for an elected assembly now?

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman knows why I do not want a Welsh Assembly. I have explained several times this afternoon. He also knows that when the opinion of the people of Wales was tested, they emphatically did not want an assembly either. Even if we agree to differ on the question of a Welsh Assembly, the hon. Gentleman knows that the Labour party published proposals for reforming the Welsh Grand Committee a couple of weeks ago and that our proposals go further than Labour's. The way in which the hon. Gentleman has characterised the whole process is highly inaccurate. We are making a sincere attempt to improve the workings of Parliament, and I think that it will succeed in that objective.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): Over the past 20 years, I have spoken to more people about devolution than almost anybody else in the House, while the Secretary of State has been in his post for only a few months. No one has ever put it to me that the answer to the problems of Wales lies in extending the powers of the Welsh Grand Committee, because 99 per cent. of the population of Wales are completely unaware of its existence. Did not the Secretary of State's statement underline how out of touch he and the rest of the Government are with the rightful demands of the people of Wales? We want the budget that he quite improperly controls to be administered democratically and accountably by an elected Welsh Assembly.

Mr. Hague: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that most of the people in Wales would not know about the Welsh Grand Committee or what it does. But that makes the case for changing its procedures, for breathing new life into it by revitalising and rejuvenating them. That is what the proposals are about. We strongly differ across the Floor of the House about the prospect of a Welsh Assembly. Conservatives believe that it would be a threat to the future of the United Kingdom, and an expensive talking shop. However, we should all be able to agree that the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee need improving and that it needs to be made into a more topical and useful forum for discussion. That is what we propose to do.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Having listened to the Secretary of State's proposal, I fear that Mogadon man is proposing a Mogadon marathon of meetings all over Wales of a Welsh Grand Committee with zero powers. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman peaked as a speaker at the age of 16. We would not want to see any changes in the powers of the Welsh Grand Committee unless they were a lead-in to a genuine democratically elected body for Wales. By now, the Secretary of State must have the clear impression that that is our attitude.

We do not want a talking shop, even a travelling talking shop, because it would still be toothless. The right hon. Gentleman talked about changing Standing Orders, but he must realise that we want a guarantee that the Standing Orders of the House will be respected in the future, in a way in which they have not been respected in the past. We want a guarantee that he will not use the Tory majority on the Floor of the House to remove the rights conferred by Standing Orders Nos. 86 and 98 for the Welsh Grand Committee to consider exclusively Welsh legislation.

Is not the Secretary of State attempting to parallel the meaningless gesture of Edward I, seven centuries ago, who promised that he would create a Prince of Wales who spoke no word of English, and then offered the young infant Edward II, who was only three months old and could not have spoken any language at all? The people want not meaningless futile gestures but a democratically elected body for Wales with real powers.

Mr. Hague: I am not sure whether to take it from the hon. Gentleman's remarks that he does not want the Welsh Grand Committee to travel to different parts of Wales, but that was the clear implication of what he said. I believe that that is an important part of the proposals and should be strongly welcomed throughout the House, as it will be in Wales.

The Labour party has one policy for Scotland, another for Wales and another for the different regions of England. It has a dog's breakfast of a policy on constitutional matters, which has not remotely been thought out with the interests of the United Kingdom at heart, but has been designed to do what Labour thinks will appease nationalist sentiments in each separate part of the kingdom.

Conservatives emphatically reject that approach. We want the United Kingdom Parliament to work effectively, so that Members from every part of the United Kingdom can use it to full and beneficial effect. I am surprised that Opposition Members have not been able to welcome more enthusiastically something that they will be able to use as much as Conservative Members will, to the benefit of their constituents and of wider public debate.

Business of the House

5.17 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): After all that excitement, I shall make a statement about next week's instalment. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 4 DECEMBER—Continuation of the Budget debate.

TUESDAY 5 DECEMBER—Conclusion of the Budget debate.

WEDNESDAY 6 DECEMBER—Until about 8 o'clock, Second Reading of the Audit (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Chemical Weapons Bill.

Motion on the criminal injuries compensation scheme.

THURSDAY 7 DECEMBER—Debate on the European Union on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

FRIDAY 8 DECEMBER—Debate on the Government's policy against crime on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 6 December, as follows:

European Standing Committee A, European Community Document 8962/94 and COM(95)434 relating to the fruit and vegetable regime.

European Standing Committee B, European Community Document 9554/95 relating to food aid.

In the following week, on Monday 11 December there will be the Second Reading of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. On Tuesday 12 December there will be the Second Reading of the Armed Forces Bill. On Wednesday 13 December, there will be Government business, the nature of which has yet to be determined. I expect Thursday 14 December to be an estimates day, subject to the recommendations of the Liaison Committee at its meeting on 5 December. Friday 15 December is, I remind the House, a non-sitting day.

[Wednesday 6 December:

European Standing Committee A—Relevant European Community documents: (a) 8962/94, Fruit and Vegetable Regime; (b) COM(95)434. Relevant reports of the European Legislation Committee: (a) HC 48-xxvii (1993-94) and HC 70-ii (1994-95); (b) HC 51-i (1995-96).

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community document: 9554/95, Food Aid; Relevant report of the European Legislation Committee: HC 70-xxvi (1994-95).

Thursday 7 December:

Debate on the European Union—Relevant documents: The Twenty-fourth Report of the Select Committee on European Legislation, Session 1994-95, on the 1996 Intergovernmental Conference: the Agenda; Democracy and Efficiency; the Role of National Parliaments (HC 239-1); Resolution of the European Parliament on the functioning of the Treaty on European Union (A4-0102/95); Report by the Commission on the operation of the Treaty on European Union (SEC(95)731); Report of the Council on the functioning of the Treaty on European Union (Cm 2866); Unnumbered Report by the Court of Auditors on the operation of the Treaty on European Union; Unnumbered Report of the Court of Justice on certain aspects of the application of the Treaty on European Union; White Paper on Developments in the European Union January-June 1995 (Cm 3130).]

Mrs. Taylor: I thank the Leader of the House for that information. May I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the exchanges at business questions last week, when the Leader of the House was asked about the BBC World Service, but said that he felt he could not respond because he could not anticipate the Budget statement? Will he look at the issue of the World Service again, because we now know that the Chancellor has slashed the World Service's capital funds by £5.4 million—a massive 20 per cent.? That tears up an agreement which was negotiated in good faith by the World Service and which was to have lasted for three years.

The BBC chairman, I understand, has expressed his concern about the impact of the cuts on the World Service, and I believe that there is widespread public support for the BBC World Service which is shared by Members on both sides of this House. Will the Leader of the House now consider a specific debate on this cost-effective service which has been struggling with a tough financial settlement and which may now have to reduce its—and therefore Britain's—voice in the world? Will he think again on that issue?

Secondly, we heard the Prime Minister today at Prime Minister's Question Time trying to defend the actions and record of Yorkshire Water in recent months. The latest figures show that while Yorkshire Water has been threatening thousands of families in Yorkshire—and West Yorkshire in particular—with rota cuts, it has been making record profits. That shows, as Yorkshire Waterwatch has said, that "it is clear that the company has had enough cash sloshing about all Summer to have dealt with the underlying problems much more quickly".

There is also a danger that Yorkshire Water might seek to use the cost-pass-through mechanism to try to make sure that investment costs are passed to consumers. Is it not time that we had a full debate on the need for better regulation of the privatised utilities so that we can air our concerns that, time after time, the interests of shareholders are put before the interests of consumers? We have seen clear examples of the concerns that have been caused by that behaviour, especially in Yorkshire, and the House should have a full debate on the regulation of the public utilities.

Finally, is the Leader of the House aware that, in recent days, Resurgence Railways has been dropped as the Government's preferred bidder to take over the Great Western Railway because it could not offer adequate financial guarantees? Today we have learnt that the first part of the passenger railway service to be privatised, the special trains division, is in deep trouble as its new owners, Waterman Railways, is in bitter dispute with BR and Railtrack about charges for track access and other services. Given the scale and frequency of the difficulties arising with rail privatisation, surely we should have a full-scale debate in the House before this fiasco goes any further.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady was perhaps more political than she usually is on these occasions, and I shall not reply in quite those terms. I cannot give any commitment to provide time for debates on any of the matters that she has raised although, as always, I shall consider what she says. I have no doubt that there will be opportunities to raise those matters in various ways in the next few weeks.

In response to the hon. Lady's comments on the first subject, I would have thought that it would probably be in order to raise that matter during the Budget debate, since it arises from what she attributes to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement on Tuesday. I shall bring all of the hon. Lady's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friends who have responsibility in those areas.

I thought that the Prime Minister made a perfectly sensible point at Prime Minister's Question Time today when he simply stated the fact that Yorkshire Water will, we understand, be investing more than £200 million this year—more than double its half-year profits. The fact is that money for investment clearly must come from somewhere, and the Opposition are always demanding more investment.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): In view of today's statement on the revenue support grant, would it be in order to debate education in the Budget debate? We could then put under the microscope the behaviour of local education authorities such as East Sussex, which are scaring parents, teachers and governors into unnecessary concerns about potential cuts which prove to be totally wrong.

Mr. Newton: It is not for me to advise my hon. Friend about what is or is not in order during the Budget debate. But I understand that it would be in order to refer to the expenditure side of the Budget under the arrangements that we now have. I am sure that even if my hon. Friend is unable to participate in the debate, her remarks will be carefully studied.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): May I commend the Leader of the House for his noble efforts to give us as much information as possible as early as possible? Close study of the Order Paper makes it very clear that the fruit and vegetable document—a very important piece of European legislation that will have a direct effect upon a great many fruit and vegetable growers and customers in this country—is to be debated on Wednesday morning and immediately voted upon on Wednesday evening.

I did hope that the Government had got away from this cavalier attitude, which assumes two things—first, that European Standing Committee A will totally accept whatever it is told on Wednesday morning, and secondly, that there will be no dissenting amendment. I hope that this will not become a habit. If it does, Parliament will get a reputation for ignoring the interests of its constituents.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful for what the hon. Lady said at the start of her question. I am not absolutely sure of the background to the point that she then went on to raise, but I shall look into it. We try to avoid the occurrence of such matters, but sometimes it becomes inevitable because of the timing of business in Europe. I shall look into what may have happened on this occasion.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Will the Leader of the House provide time for an urgent and early debate on the future of selective schools in England? If those schools are not allowed to select their pupils—either by examination or by interview—they will become comprehensive schools. That is an important fact to advertise in the House and elsewhere in the nation.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has raised an important point, but I do not think that I can promise time for a dedicated debate, as it were. But it was clear from the Gracious Speech that there will be a number of opportunities to debate education matters during this Session.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Following on from the question from the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait), will the Leader of the House confirm that there will as usual be a debate before we rise for Christmas on the local government settlement pursuant to today's statement? Can he give an indication as to the dates of the specific supplementary legislative proposals to implement the Scottish and Welsh procedural changes announced by the two Secretaries of State yesterday and today?

Mr. Newton: On the latter point, I cannot at present give a specific time for the debates. We would like to get the changes agreed by the House as soon as possible in order that their beneficial effects should be felt as soon as possible. I have forgotten the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Hughes: The local government settlement.

Mr. Newton: I am not sure if the hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is normally a debate before Christmas. I shall look into it, but my recollection is that the matter is normally debated when the orders are brought before the House in the early part of the new year.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): May we have a debate next week on race relations, so that we can investigate the deplorable remarks apparently made by a prominent member of the Labour party from Leicester on "Dispatches" only last night? Regarding the deputy leadership of Leicester city council, he asked:

"Why should we have a white person?"

May we have a debate so that we can discuss whether such overt racist language is Labour party policy?

Mr. Newton: I did not see the programme, but I am aware of reports of it. In view of the serious nature of the allegations that have been made, I am sure that they will be carefully examined, not only by the hon. Gentleman himself but by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In view of the excellent work being carried out by President Clinton, be it now in Northern Ireland or what he has done in Bosnia, and the excellent speech that he gave to us yesterday, will the Prime Minister make some sort of apology next week for how the Conservative party actively tried to stop President Clinton being elected and quite likely used Home Office records to try to prove that he dodged the draft?

Mr. Newton: Such a question contributes nothing to what we would all like to achieve. I endorse the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the quality of the President's address yesterday. Having been present at that speech and at some more informal exchanges between the President and the Prime Minister, I assure the hon. Gentleman that the relationship between them is very warm.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May I support the call for a debate on the funding of the BBC World Service because it has an immensely high standing around the world, giving intensified stature to this country among listeners around the world? I would differentiate strictly between the World Service and the BBC's domestic service which is not of such a high standard. The advantage of such a debate is that it would show that Ministers have paid careful attention to the funding of the World Service. They could explain the split funding between grant through the Foreign Office vote and the possibilities for commercial income for the BBC.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's suggestion. Like the representation of the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), I shall bring it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): As a debate on the local government settlement has been called for, would not it be a good idea, as Ministers have lessons in French and German on the all-party Whip—I have never been—to hold arithmetic lessons for Ministers? We heard the story about £870 million extra for education. Along comes a Minister today and we find out that it is all made up of wage increases and inflation. The result in Derbyshire and many other authorities is that schools will be about £40 per pupil worse off this year than last. It is all a mirage. Let us get the sums done properly.

Mr. Newton: I do not, of course, accept the hon. Gentleman's suggestions. This is a substantial additional sum for education. One thing at least is clear: the hon. Gentleman needs no lessons in English.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an urgent debate on early-day motion 3?

[That this House calls on the Government to acknowledge that over 3,000 people with haemophilia have been infected with hepatitis C virus (HCV) as a result of NHS treatment with contaminated blood products; recognises that over 50 people with haemophilia are now understood to have died from liver disease contracted as a result; and considers giving similar financial assistance to those infected with HCV, who currently receive no additional help, as for those infected in the same way with HIV who have been compensated by the Government.]

He will be aware that the motion has been signed by 250 hon. Members from both sides of the House, which is almost a majority of those eligible to sign an early-day motion. The cost of such a concession would be relatively slight, and it would right a fundamental wrong.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend knows of previous responsibilities that I have had in similar matters. I therefore have great sympathy with those who may inadvertently have been infected with hepatitis C through national health service treatment, but the patients received the best treatment available in the light of medical knowledge at the time. In the absence of negligence, I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has no plans for special payments.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): When is the Leader of the House likely to proceed with the orders dealing with reorganisation of local authorities that are to have elections in 1997? I hesitate to mention my authority today in view of the criticism, much of it unfair. As the Leader of the House knows, Leicester has been a model for race relations in the United Kingdom for the past 20 years. However, there is increasing concern in my city about the delay in proceeding with the order. Will he seek to allay that fear and give a definite date?

Mr. Newton: I am afraid that I cannot give a definite date this afternoon but I shall bring the hon. Gentleman's question to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who will be responsible for proceeding with the orders.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): If we cannot have a debate on the water industry, particularly Yorkshire Water, will the Leader of the House encourage the Secretary of State for the Environment to make a statement to the House, I hope to announce a wholly independent public inquiry into the affairs of Yorkshire Water, which seems to combine breathtaking incompetence with awesome contempt for its customers?

On the Asylum and Immigration Bill, will the Leader of the House ensure that the so-called white list of safe third countries is published before the Bill's Second Reading, which is to take place a week on Monday?

Mr. Newton: I cannot be as helpful as I would naturally like to be on either point. I have already referred to the Yorkshire Water question, as did my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. On the latter point, I was present at Home Office questions earlier today when the Minister of State, Home Office commented on that subject. I cannot add to that this afternoon.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When can we debate the savings that could be made by replacing Select Committee trips abroad by techniques such as video conferencing? Not only would that be much more efficient and save a great deal of money, but it might produce much better reports. Has the Leader of the House noticed that many of the reports compiled in the House are much better than those delivered by Committees that travel far abroad? Does not that prove the Chinese proverb that the further one travels, the less one knows?

Mr. Winnick: I would not put it to the vote.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has been more helpful than I can ever remember him being before. I shall rest on his comment.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 134:

[That this House welcomes the visit of President Clinton to this country and looks forward to the continuation of good relations between the United Kingdom and the USA; believes, however, that this would be better served by good corporate behaviour of British firms in America; and deplores the attempts by Hanson to cut the wages and conditions of their employees in California.]

Will he arrange time for a debate on the behaviour of British corporations abroad? Should not they enhance Britain's reputation abroad rather than damage it, as Hanson is doing by cutting the wages and conditions of workers in California?

Mr. Newton: Just as the corporate activities of United States companies here would be a matter for them subject to United Kingdom law, the corporate activities of British companies in the United States are a matter for them as governed by US law.

BILLS PRESENTED

Rating (Caravans and Boats)

Mr. Secretary Gummer, supported by Mr. Secretary Lang, Mrs. Secretary Bottomley, Mr. Secretary Forsyth, Mr. Secretary Hague, Mrs. Angela Knight, Mr. David Curry and Sir Paul Beresford, presented a Bill to make provision about liability for non-domestic rates in England and Wales in relation to certain caravans and boats: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 4 December and to be printed. [Bill 9.]

Health Service Commissioners (Amendment)

Mr. Secretary Dorrell, supported by Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew, Mr. Secretary Forsyth, Mr. Roger Freeman, Mr. Secretary Hague and Mr. Gerald Malone, presented a Bill to make provision about the Health Service Commissioners: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Monday 4 December and to be printed. [Bill 10.]

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Probation

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(4) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

That the Probation (Amendment) Rules 1995 (S. I., 1995, No. 2622) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming debate on Question [28 November].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply, acquisition or importation otherwise than by—

(i) zero-rating or exempting supplies of goods which are, or are to be, subjected to a fiscal or other warehousing regime; or

(ii) zero-rating or exempting supplies of services on or in relation to such goods;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax otherwise than to persons constructing or converting buildings in cases where the construction or conversion is not in the course or furtherance of a business;

(c) for varying any rate at which that tax is at any time chargeable; or

(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

5.38 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): I welcome the opportunity of this resumed debate on the Budget to emphasise what my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has made clear in each of his Budgets: that the single most important contribution that the Government can make to fostering growth and improving competitiveness—both of which are essential for business success and national prosperity—is to provide a stable macro-economic background. That means controlling public spending, achieving and sustaining low inflation and keeping Government borrowing and taxation low. Hence we have a Budget that works towards those objectives: Government borrowing falling to zero in the medium term; getting public spending to below 40 per cent. of national income; getting inflation down below 2.5 per cent. and keeping it there; and progress towards a 20 per cent. basic rate of income tax. The Budget that my right hon. and learned Friend delivered on Tuesday enshrined all of those objectives. It leaves people and business with more of what they earn and spends more on what they care about.

The Budget reaffirms our overriding commitment to providing the framework and conditions under which enterprise and wealth creation can flourish. It cannot be said too often that businesses and individuals, not Governments, create wealth. We need to encourage and reward their hard work and prudent savings, which are the foundations for future investment.

All 26 million income tax payers will gain from the income tax cuts that my right hon. and learned Friend announced on Tuesday. Savers will benefit from the reduction, from 25p to 20p, of tax on savings income. The package of help for business announced by my right hon. and learned Friend addresses business concerns directly, which is perhaps why it was so warmly welcomed by the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): On the concerns of business, why has the right hon. Gentleman reneged on the commitment given by his predecessor to reduce the Post Office's external financing limit and instead doubled it so that an extra £400 million will be taken out of the Post Office? That will increase prices for the ordinary customer and massively restrict the Post Office's ability to modernise and invest in new sorting equipment and so forth. Is that not just another hidden tax and an example of the Government giving with one hand and taking away with the other?

Mr. Lang: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister did not give the firm commitment that the hon. Gentleman suggests. He gave an indication of what the Government's aim would be and expressed the hope that it would be possible to make progress. We have indeed made progress with the arrangements that my right hon. Friend set out last May.

We have abolished the capital expenditure limit with its associated scrutiny of individual projects. We have a new corporate planning process. We have said that we shall consider moves by the Royal Mail into adjacent markets and that we shall continue to build on that progress. It is surely beyond reason to expect that the Post Office, a major organisation, should be entirely exempt from the sort of budgetary pressures that afflict every other public service and Government Department. That is the approach that my right hon. Friend took.

Mr. Hain: I am probably testing the right hon. Gentleman's patience, but may I remind him that his predecessor imposed an external financing limit for the coming financial year which the right hon. Gentleman has now increased by £120 million? The Post Office cannot borrow on the open market because the Government will not let it. It has to invest from its own resources. Why is the right hon. Gentleman denying it the ability to do so and therefore denying it the ability to compete in Europe and become the best Post Office in Europe, not just the best Post Office in Britain?

Mr. Lang: We have an extremely good record on the performance of the Post Office. It is certainly not being starved of investment. It is an organisation which is spending, and should have the scope to continue to spend, at double the rate that it spent when the Government came into office. At constant prices, it spent a total of £800 million in the five years Labour was in power. Between 1989 and 1994, that figure increased to £1.7 billion. We have a good record on the Post Office and I am anxious to build on it as soon as circumstances allow.

I shall now revert to the benefits for business that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor announced in his Budget. We have cut employers' national insurance contributions by £500 million a year from April 1997 and we have cut the maximum real increase in business rates under the relief scheme by 2½ per cent. compared with last year's Budget, but the request that I hear most often from business is for low inflation.

All the major business organisations called for the safeguarding of the stable macro-economic environment that the Government have put in place. We have set a firm target for underlying inflation and we remain resolved to drive it down and keep it down. Inflation has now been below 4 per cent. for more than three and a half years and below 3 per cent. for much of that time. That is the best performance for 50 years. We are breaking the inflationary culture that the policies of the Labour party did so much to engender.

The stable and profitable climate for business that we are delivering is the surest way to encourage investment in our economy, but we have also been engaged in a programme of long-term structural change to the United Kingdom's economy. It involves reducing burdens on business, extending the scope of market forces, promoting competition at home and abroad and helping business to help itself.

We have at all times been concerned to create an economic climate that encourages and rewards enterprise. We recognised long ago the importance to our economy of a thriving small business sector. It is the backbone of our economy and the engine of growth and new jobs for the future. Today, there are more than 1 million more small businesses than there were in 1979.

Small business remains at the heart of our agenda, where it has always been. While the Labour party was opposing enterprise—or, as now, simply talking about it—we have, year after year, brought in measures to help small business. Through changes to PAYE, national insurance, income and corporation taxes, VAT, accounting and auditing requirements; and with loan guarantees, venture capital trusts and investment schemes and a host of other measures, we have shown our commitment to small business and we will continue to do so.

We have invited small firms representative bodies to organise a series of conferences to involve small businesses more directly in generating future policies to help them. We are participating fully in that programme, which will culminate in a national conference to be held in London next March.

We have established a new team of small firms Ministers across Whitehall. They are responsible for ensuring that the interests of the sector are taken into account in the development of all aspects of Government policy. The Budget contained a wide range of measures further to boost small businesses and enterprise. It cut taxes on profits. The reduction in the small companies rate of corporation tax will help 300,000 small companies, while the cut in the basic rate of income tax will reduce the tax burden on a very large number of unincorporated businesses.

The Budget helped small firms with the cost of business rates following revaluation. More than 800,000 smaller properties will benefit from the maximum real increase being cut from 7½ per cent. to 5 per cent. It cut the qualifying age for capital gains tax retirement relief, thereby encouraging and rewarding entrepreneurship, and significantly extended the threshold before which assets will be liable for inheritance tax. It simplified the tax system and raised the VAT threshold.

However, it is not just through the taxation system that we are helping small business. We are also putting in place the most extensive and effective infrastructure to assist small business that the country has ever had. Business Link is a central element in our strategy to help small firms. It is reaching out to companies with a will to grow by providing long-term support tailored to the needs of individual firms. For the first time, local firms have a simple route to a comprehensive range of high-quality, integrated business support services in areas such as export planning, finance, design, innovation and modern technology.

More than 70 per cent. of the Business Link network is already in place, and by next April we expect some 250 outlets to be open, covering the whole of England. Scotland and Wales are developing similar networks known as Scottish Business Shops and Business Connect Wales.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The President of the Board of Trade has been talking at some length about all the help that the Government are giving small business. Does he include in that the proposal to introduce substantial penalties on employers who employ illegal entrants? Will not the inevitable consequence of that measure be that many small business people, fearful of such penalties, will refuse to employ anyone who comes from abroad, particularly anyone from an ethnic minority?

Mr. Lang: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, as with all the other measures that the Government introduce, the particular circumstances of small businesses will be taken into account.

Business has already given Business Link an overwhelming thumbs up. More than 4,000 businesses a week are using the network, and 95 per cent. of customers surveyed have expressed satisfaction with the service. The Budget provided funding to enable the Business Link network to be completed. The Budget has also allowed me to increase the funding for its services so that it can meet the demand from business for integrated, world-class business support services.

Bad regulation bears down disproportionately on small firms. Business men and women must be free to concentrate on creating wealth rather than filling in forms. We have sought out unnecessary regulations which raise prices, destroy jobs and stifle innovation and choice. Business has been brisk. We have found more than 1,000 such regulations and we shall have amended or repealed more than half of them by the end of the year, but we are by no means content to rest there. We are determined to continue to look positively at deregulation, particularly where regulation impinges on small business.

We shall continue to oppose the imposition of new burdens on small business. The policies of the Labour party—the national minimum wage, the social chapter and its payroll tax—would place intolerable new burdens on small business. It is clear that the needs of small business are the last thing on Labour's mind.

Deregulation and our policies to encourage enterprise have been essential elements of our long-term agenda to transform the competitiveness of the British economy. The Government's privatisation programme is also a part of that agenda. Privatisation and liberalisation have revitalised huge swathes of the economy that lay moribund under state ownership. The success of our policies is reflected by the increasing number of countries of all political persuasions which are now following our lead. It is only in the British Labour party that abject short-termism and socialist dogma still prevail.

What is the Labour party's response to the growing success story? Its response is to seek revenge in the form of a windfall tax. At the time of the utilities' privatisation, the Labour party claimed that they were doomed to failure. Now that they have achieved greater efficiencies and success than Labour thought possible, Labour will penalise them with a windfall tax—which would be unfair, capricious and penalise success. It would also be retrospective.

Retrospective taxation destroys incentives to improve performance and make profits. If there are no profits, there are no funds for investment. If there is no investment, the quality of services in the utilities will be under threat and consumers will end up facing price increases rather than continuing to enjoy the downward trend in prices. Consumers would suffer as the quality of services fell and their cost rose.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The Secretary of State mentioned that the utilities had forced down prices. Is he aware that the price of electricity to large users has not changed at all? Can he tell us what he intends to do about that, as it clearly affects British competitiveness?

Mr. Lang: I shall provide figures on prices in a moment. For the moment, let me continue on the topic of the windfall tax to which the Labour party is so committed. Indeed, it is one of the few identifiable commitments that we have managed to get out of the Labour party.

The Labour party implies that the windfall tax is a free tax and that no one will get hurt. There is no such thing as a free tax. I have already mentioned the cost to consumers of the tax, but it would also be a betrayal of all the investors in the privatised companies, because they would have to pay for it. It would be a tax on millions of small individual investors. It would be a tax on the pension funds and the life assurance companies on which individuals rely for their future security. They are the people who would be betrayed by the Labour party, and all because Labour needs to find money to finance its desires for higher spending. A windfall tax has nothing whatever to do with fairness.

A windfall tax is by definition a one-off tax. It cannot be used for recurring spending programmes, yet the Labour party plans to spend the proceeds of the tax not only year after year, but on 10 separate policy commitments. The Labour party's sums simply do not add up.

Let us examine the successes of the privatised industries, which Labour policies would put at risk. The regulatory system has turned the past profits of the utilities into price cuts for consumers. Telecommunications prices are down more than 35 per cent. in real terms since privatisation. With liberalisation and growing competition, customers can expect to continue to benefit from lower prices. Domestic gas prices, excluding VAT, are down more than 23 per cent., and industrial gas prices are down 40 per cent. since privatisation. The deregulation of the gas market, which comes on stream next year, will mean that customers can expect prices to fall further still. Domestic electricity is down by 7 per cent. Next year, through tighter new price controls, the flotation of the National Grid and the phasing out of the nuclear levy, customers can expect, on average, about £90 off their bills.

Our telecommunications, electricity and gas prices for industry are among the lowest in Europe, and they are helping industry in this country to win. The privatised companies are delivering not only lower prices but better services. More than 95 per cent. of British Telecom's telephone boxes now work, and there are 50 per cent. more of them. Before privatisation, 250,000 people were waiting to have a telephone installed; now there are no waiting lists. Utilities now guarantee standards of service, and their guarantees are backed up by compensation. They have codes of practice on the services that they deliver to elderly and disabled customers.

The taxpayer has also enjoyed benefits from privatisation. Under the Labour party, nationalised industries cost taxpayers £50 million a week, which was more than £120 a year for every household in the country. Today, the privatised utilities contribute £55 million a week to the Exchequer.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): The President of the Board of Trade has not mentioned the privatised water companies. What would he say to Severn Trent Water which, the day before the Budget, announced an increase in profits of 75 per cent. to £160 million, but offered its customers a rebate of only £4 a year? That is not value for money for the customer.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman seems to overlook the fact that the water industry has for a long time needed increased capital investment. Like all publicly owned utilities and nationalised industries, it has been starved of resources over the years. It is now in a position to raise the necessary money through the private sector and in the market. Yorkshire Water plans to invest no less than £2.5 billion over the next 10 years. Such an upgrading of the system could not have been contemplated under the previous arrangements, but can be now.

The privatised utilities have benefited not only consumers, shareholders and the Exchequer, but the economy. The privatised industries are investing in modern infrastructure that will benefit Britain for decades to come, and they have had an unparalleled record on investment since privatisation. More than £25 billion has been invested by BT on modernising the network and installing new technologies, and more than £4.5 billion was invested in telecommunications last year. Fifteen billion pounds has been invested in water to date, which answers more specifically the question asked by the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping). Our water companies are now delivering some of the cleanest water in Europe. By comparison, under the Labour Government, capital investment fell in electricity, gas, telecommunications and water.

Against that background, it can be said with certainty that independent regulation of the utilities. operating at arm's length from the Government and with competition introduced wherever possible, has worked well. It provides incentives for companies to improve their performance and mechanisms to ensure that customers benefit from the improvements. The regulators have also required the utility companies to meet demanding new standards of service. As a result, customers have benefited in respect of price and quality of service.

There is never a shortage of ideas for changes to the regulatory system. Where those changes would help the regulators with their job and improve public understanding of what is being done, the regulators themselves are quick to respond.

The regulators have wide powers under existing legislation to introduce changes to regulation, but they are all putting increasing emphasis on consultation before taking major decisions. They actively encourage public debate through consultation papers, explanatory reports and discussion at conferences and other open occasions. The wider involvement of interested parties raises the quality and integrity of decision making as the regime develops.

Some of the regulators have appointed, or are considering the appointment of, groups of advisers to help with specific issues or for continuing advice. That is a sign of a flexible and responsive regulatory system. In addition, as competition develops—for example, in the telecommunications market—the regulator seeks to remove detailed interventionist rules. That will allow companies to respond more flexibly and innovatively to customer needs and market developments.

The current structure is highly adaptable, so there is at present no case for fundamental change. As I said, the regulatory system is in an evolutionary phase. The process will no doubt continue, and rightly so. The Government will certainly continue to keep the system under review to ensure that it reflects the developing market.

As the system evolves, however, it will build on a record of solid achievement. Independent regulators and increasingly tight price formulae, with an incentive element built in, have been delivering impressive results to customers and developing impressive utility companies at the same time, but competition rather than regulation is the key to even greater improvements.

There is no doubt that there is scope for more competition and, therefore, more consumer choice, especially in the energy and water sectors. Competition between suppliers is already a fact of life in telecommunications and for medium and larger users of electricity and gas. It has produced clear benefits, which are important for the international competitiveness of British industry.

We are determined to press ahead with the further opening up of the markets. The first phase of the introduction of competition to the domestic gas market will take place next year, with full competition in 1998. The electricity industry is also preparing for full competition in 1998. Also in 1998, all users of electricity and gas will have the opportunity to benefit from competitive choice—on top of the large reductions in energy prices which they have already experienced or which are in the pipeline.

There is also scope for extending competition in the supply of water and waste water services, in the first instance for larger users. Consequently the Government are working on proposals with the Director General of Water Services and will publish a consultation paper early next year. This all shows that, as a result of the Government's policies, we have a dynamic evolving utilities sector which is increasingly delivering, at lower cost than before, the services that customers want.

We have not restricted our efforts to deregulate and increase competition to the private sector.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement that electricity customers are likely to benefit from reductions of, on average, up to £90 in their bills next year is extremely welcome? What effect does he expect that and, in particular, the £50 National Grid rebate, to have on the retail prices index?

Mr. Lang: I can, with confidence, say that it will drive the RPI downwards. It is more difficult to calculate the precise effect that it will have on the RPI. In the long term, the price reductions that have been coming through in all the utilities that I have mentioned will undoubtedly be of great benefit in reducing the cost of living.

The public sector has also been opened up to the rigours of the marketplace through the private finance initiative. The PFI brings together the public and private sectors to the advantage of both. It brings the enterprise and discipline of the private sector into areas which have, until recently, been regarded as the domain of the public sector. The state cannot and should not try to do everything. We need to find new, innovative and more efficient ways of delivering public services and major capital investments. The PFI enables the Government to move away from being the provider of services to being an intelligent purchaser of services for the taxpayer.

The PFI will generate increased investment in infrastructure and public services. The Government are on course to let contracts worth £14 billion over the next three years—£5 billion this year alone. Substantial progress has already been made across a range of Government activities. For example, a deal was signed earlier this year with GEC Alsthom to supply a new train service for the Northern line. The first tranche of contracts for design-build-finance-operate road projects is due to be signed shortly. A further £500 million-worth of privately financed road schemes was announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor on Tuesday. The net result will be the better and more efficient delivery of services.

Sir Michael Grylls (North-West Surrey): I am listening carefully to what my right hon. Friend is saying about the PFI, which is a marvellous innovation that should be useful. To help it work more efficiently and speedily, will my right hon. Friend consider bringing in outside business men and women to advise Government Departments as they negotiate contracts? Experience seems to show that, generally, civil servants are not very good at negotiating. If people were brought in from the private sector, the PFI might get going much faster.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend makes a positive suggestion and I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor is sitting on the Front Bench to hear it. We share the objective of wanting to ensure as substantial and effective a take-up of existing PFI opportunities as possible.

As for the issues that we are considering in the Budget debate, we listen and wait in vain for any sign of the Labour party's policies. The Labour party does not have a view on any issue that arises in the debate. It has no view on taxation; it has no view on the level of interest rates; it has no view on inflation.

Perhaps the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) will enlighten us all today. We know that, in general terms, the Labour party wants to raise spending and introduce more policies that would cost money but, although it generally wants lower taxes, it abstains on my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget when it comes to resolving the issue. What a wonderful posture of high-mindedness and principle the Labour party adopts to seek to persuade the electorate that it represents their interests.

We know that the Labour party wants to raise spending, but we know that it is not prepared to face up to the issues of funding; we know that it wants to reduce taxes, but when we introduce proposals to reduce taxes across the board it abstains. Its sole interest is in party political advantage instead of the national interest. Why else would it take every opportunity to talk down the country? I should like to offer it a few facts that will help it to stand up for the country for a change.

Our gross domestic product per head is 10 per cent. ahead of that of Europe as a whole. During the past 15 years, our growth has been faster than the average growth of the European Union. Our living standards have risen by 40 per cent. since 1979, whereas they rose by only 1 per cent. under the Labour Government. This year's Budget will help further to increase that figure of 40 per cent. With the fastest productivity growth rate, we have closed three quarters of the gap in manufacturing productivity with France and Germany since 1979—a gap that widened under the Labour Government.

Since 1979, total investment and total investment in the business sector have risen faster than in France, Germany or Italy. The 1980s were the first decade since the second world war in which our economy grew faster than those of Germany and France. The UK now has a higher proportion of its population of working age in work than any other major European Union country.

Those are some signs of the progress that has been made in recent years under this Government. We have achieved success through the huge structural changes that we have made to our economy—making it more competitive and freeing up enterprise. Britain is now well placed to build on the significant progress that has been achieved.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has delivered a good Budget for business. He has delivered a Budget that furthers the competitive gains that we have made during the past 16 years. He has delivered a Budget that reinforces the Government's commitment to permanently low inflation and sustained economic growth. He has delivered a Budget that reduces taxes and provides incentives for saving.

The Budget provides support to small firms, both through taxation and through resources for practical assistance. It reflects the long-term economic strategy of the Government: low inflation; incentives for enterprise; firm control of public expenditure; and a climate for sustained growth. I commend it to the House.

6.6 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Every Member of Parliament now knows that this is a dishonest Budget. We do not need a sophisticated analysis of the detail to show us that—we have a simple parliamentary litmus test. There have been six statements in two days and two Budget debates that have barely started before 6 pm. If the Government were really so proud of the Budget, they would not be trying so hard to hide it.

What we needed on Tuesday was a Budget for Britain, a Budget to secure our country's future, a Budget to promote and sustain investment in that future. What we received was, unfortunately, what we feared: a Budget, the main—probably sole—purpose of which was to secure the Conservative party's future. The Budget reinforced our criticism of the Government's lamentable record on investment.

The Budget reveals that the Conservative party is beginning to resemble a clapped-out old car. Its steering has gone and it can only lurch to the right, the tax has run out and it has been burning oil, North sea oil, for years—£128 billion worth of oil, to be exact. It is no wonder that the Tories cannot flog the old banger to the people of Britain. We can imagine the advertisement in the paper: "16 years old; one not-too-careful lady owner; split down the middle; none of the seats is safe."

The Budget shows, yet again, a Government praising themselves for their aspirations and ignoring their record. How do we judge the worth of those aspirations? First, in the light of the Government's past record and secondly, in the light of their present intentions as revealed in the Budget. The Chancellor told us several times in his speech that he wanted to make Britain the enterprise centre of Europe. This week, the Government's efforts to promote enterprise, of which the Secretary of State has just been bragging, have produced some interesting effects. I think that we would all agree that it takes enterprise and flair to run out of water in Yorkshire. It takes unbelievable acumen to be involved in a business that supplies only one product, to fail to provide that product and still to increase profits by 50 per cent. Is that what the Government mean by "the enterprise economy"?

That is not, of course, the only example of the Government's record on enterprise. The National Engineering Laboratory was recently privatised. What did the sale raise to help fund the Government's programme? It appears to have raised less than nothing—to be precise, minus £1.5 million. Far from raising money from that sale, the Government appear to have paid someone to take the NEL away.

Another money loser, as well as a vote loser, is the privatisation of Railtrack. It now appears that Railtrack, with assets estimated at £6 billion, might be sold for as little as £1.5 billion—£1 billion less than was anticipated—in the rush to get it on to the stock exchange by April 1996, a rush that almost certainly has far more to do with the need for it to contribute to the Government's accounts than with sound business management of the sale.

A recent analysis of Railtrack's accounts by the Independent suggests that the company may have set aside more than £1 billion from its investment budget to repay debt and boost the balance sheet before privatisation—yet more evidence of the Government's failure on investment, to put alongside the use of £1 billion of public money to meet the costs of privatisation, money which could have been used for investment.

Then there is the privatisation of the nuclear power stations. Some disquiet has already been expressed about the general safety aspects and implications of that privatisation, and about whether the timetable might be somewhat tight, being driven by the Government's need for funds rather than the public interest. Now, that already tight timetable is rumoured to have been further curtailed because Railtrack's privatisation will not raise the sums anticipated, thus creating fresh doubts about safety.

That is probably also the privatisation that most evidently blows out of the water the Government's claim to be, and to be uniquely, the party that understands about how business should work, because that is the privatisation in which, most evidently, the Government are selling the assets and keeping the liabilities. It also blows out of the water their claim to be good stewards on behalf of the British people, because those are liabilities that, through their electricity bills, people have already paid to cover. Thanks to the Government's business acumen, we shall end up paying, not once, not even twice, but three times.

Before the original privatisation, the Central Electricity Generating Board held assets that more than offset its liabilities.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: Not at the moment.

However, when those assets were sold, the money was used to contribute to tax cuts and Nuclear Electric was left with £10 billion of unsecured liabilities. The non-fossil fuel levy was invented entirely—

Mr. Stern: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: Not at the moment. I am right in the middle of an argument. I know that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to interrupt it. The non-fossil fuel levy was invented entirely to cover those liabilities, again at the electricity customer's expense. It was in effect another tax. Nuclear Electric chose to invest much of the income from that tax, saying that it needed to ensure that it had future cash flow and assets to cover those liabilities. Those assets are now, in turn, to be sold again and the cash again used as a contribution to, and justification for, tax cuts, leaving the Magnox company once more with the unsecured liabilities.

Customers will have paid three times: first, through the earlier price levels to build up CEGB assets, secondly, through the non-fossil fuel levy used to rebuild them after privatisation and thirdly, to cover the liabilities that the Government said that those assets were twice supposed to meet.

Mr. Stern: The right hon. Lady has summarised the letter that many of us received from power unions to good effect. May I remind her, however, that when the Select Committee on Energy reported on exactly the matters to which she now refers, it pointed out clearly and with factual backing that it was not the case that the CEGB had provided for those liabilities, and that it was because the CEGB had not even calculated, let alone provided for, those liabilities that the nuclear power stations could not be included in the privatisation?

Mrs. Beckett: I understand that the Select Committee continues to examine those matters. I take the hon. Gentleman's point when he says that he would argue that the assets of the CEGB would not wholly have covered those liabilities, although I believe that, as it is so difficult to calculate, it is hard to say whether that is wholly true. However, that does not alter at all—as I believe that the hon. Gentleman conceded—my basic argument that the CEGB did have assets that would have contributed towards meeting those liabilities, and those assets, like the ones that replaced them, have been destroyed by the Government, leaving the liabilities in place. I repeat the main point of those observations, which is that that is a clear sign of what we should think of the Government's business acumen.

However, the Government's appalling record in protecting and advancing the interests of the people is, in its own way, wonderfully consistent. Alone among the G7 countries, alone in Europe, the Conservatives formed the Government who had the windfall benefits of North sea oil—benefits that they used to cover the consequences and costs of their failure and incompetence.

I listened today to the President of the Board of Trade going on about the Government's investment record, as Conservatives so often do—usually not very accurately, but never mind—and comparing it with the investment record of the last Labour Government, which was, of course, hit by a fourfold or fivefold increase in the price of oil, something that the present Government have not yet sustained. What I never hear the Government mention, and what the President of the Board of Trade slid over today, is the fact that the Conservatives have had benefits worth £128 billion at today's prices from the North sea alone. That is the equivalent of about £22 million a day for every single day of the 16 years that the Conservatives have been in office.

In addition, the Conservatives have had, and squandered, the proceeds of privatisation—what the late Harold Macmillan called "selling the family silver"—£80 billion in today's prices. That is the equivalent of a further £13 million a day for every single day of the 16 years that they have been in office. The Conservatives have had £35 million a day for every day that they have been in power for 16 years; £35 million a day that no British Government will ever have again because they have squandered it; £35 million a day that they could have invested in Britain's future if, for 16 years, they had not put the future of the Conservative party first.

That process of squeezing public assets and squeezing the public's purse goes on. I was very interested in the observations that my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) made about the attack on the Post Office. He drew attention to the fact that the Treasury will double the amount of cash that it will take from the Post Office—an additional £400 million during the next three years—making a total of £1 billion during that time.

The President of the Board of Trade implied that that was not especially unexpected; at least he disputed with my hon. Friend the Member for Neath the statement of the then President of the Board of Trade, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), on 11 May 1995. I just happen to have a copy of statement about my person. The then Secretary of State said:

> "I am prepared to agree that in future we shall aim to set the EFL at about half the Post Office's forecast post-tax profit. I hope to make progress in that direction this autumn."—[Official Report, 11 May 1995; Vol. 259, c. 885.]

Mr. Lang: Hope.

Mrs. Beckett: The Secretary of State draws to my attention the word "hope"—and no doubt also the word "aim". I believe that it is clear to all of us that words in the mouth of Ministers in the present Government mean nothing, and that is one of many examples—as is the word "promise".

However, one thing that is also clear is that that further impost on the Post Office, taking as much from it in the next three years as the Government have taken in the past 10, will have two effects. First, it makes an early increase in postal charges almost inevitable—a Tory stamp tax on the ordinary people and the businesses of the country. Secondly, it means that much-needed investment in the Post Office will have to be shelved. It also probably renders the Post Office open to competition from elsewhere in the European Union.

Most commentators say that this year's was a neutral Budget. Some give the Chancellor a feeble cheer for not going more blatantly for cosmetic tax cuts, but it was a cheer that he did not deserve. We know that, on the latest Red Book forecasts, the total tax burden as a proportion of gross domestic product continues to be planned to increase until the end of the century. We all know that in April next year a typical family will continue to pay £670 a year more in tax than it did when the Conservatives were re-elected in 1992 on a platform that promised overall tax cuts. They did not aim, they did not hope, they promised tax cuts, and then delivered 21 tax increases, equivalent, as the Chancellor has acknowledged, to 7p in the pound on the basic rate of tax.

It is forecast that the public sector borrowing requirement, the deficit in the Government's finances, will be down to about £22 billion next year. Last year, the Chancellor said that it would be below that by now. Growth was forecast to reach 2.75 per cent. this year and 3 per cent. next year. Last year, the Chancellor promised that it would be higher than that by now. Meanwhile, back in the real world, year-on-year growth is running at around a meagre 2 per cent. Last year, the Chancellor forecast investment growth at 5.75 per cent.; now he says that it will be 1 per cent. Growth is down on his forecast, and so is investment. What is up on his forecast? Inflation, the trade deficit, the balance of payments deficit and the deficit in public finances—the public sector borrowing requirement. That is all part of the Government's record.

What are the Government's present intentions? Before the Budget, the CBI said that we needed a Budget for investment—a Budget to promote investment in industry, and to sustain investment in education and training. It also said that what we did not need was a Budget in which cuts in income tax were offered at the expense of investment in infrastructure.

Mr. Tim Smith: The CBI welcomed the Budget.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman says—from a sedentary position, no doubt exercising due caution—that the CBI welcomed the Budget. Indeed, the CBI put out a very balanced press release. I think the Secretary of State said that it had given the Budget a warm welcome; that is going a bit over the top, although it does use the words "we welcome". It also says:

"Public borrowing is higher than we had hoped for . . . We will need to see the details to assess this"— the public capital expenditure cut, that is—

"in full."

The CBI also says:

"it is vital that the resources available for . . . transport . . . education and training and export support are at least maintained . . . the Private Finance Initiative is coming on stream too slowly to make up for the cuts in public capital spending in the Government's present plans."

I would not call that a warm welcome.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Anthony Nelson): What are the Opposition's proposals?

Mrs. Beckett: I would be grateful if the Minister for Trade would be quiet. He knows perfectly well what our proposals are; in fact, the Secretary of State spent some time attacking them in his speech.

Mr. Lang: The right hon. Lady has missed out one or two points in the CBI's press release. It welcomed

"the fact that the Government has broadly stuck to the prudent economic line" that it had recommended. It was "pleased that the Chancellor appears to have limited tax cuts to reductions in spending and resisted the temptation to go for excessive tax cuts."

As for public borrowing, the CBI was "satisfied that it still appears to be on a downward path."

It welcomed

"the priority the Chancellor gave to education spending".

In the tax reductions, it was "pleased to see some specific measures such as help given to small businesses".

As for personal taxation, it stated:

"we welcome the raising of thresholds and the broadening of the 20 per cent. band."

I think that that is a pretty warm welcome.

Mrs. Beckett: The Secretary of State is unduly defensive—perhaps revealingly defensive. I made the very point that this was a balanced press release that welcomed many elements in the Budget; I then drew attention to the reservations expressed by the CBI. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well which are the most important points. I am dealing with the measures that the CBI called for—and the right hon. Gentleman is well aware that it was given none of those measures.

Last year, bodies such as the CBI, the chambers of commerce and the Engineering Employers Federation called on the Chancellor for significant capital allowances to stimulate investment in new plant and machinery. This year, those bodies called on him again for such capital investment. They got zilch. The Secretary of State was too busy telling the CBI that it was its duty to come to the rescue of the Conservative party—to remember whose side it was on, as he so gracefully put it—to worry about helping it to come to the rescue of a faltering economy.

Both the Chancellor and the President of the Board of Trade are fond of quoting figures to the effect that investment has increased substantially over the past year; but that one-year increase is quoted to disguise how low is the level to which investment has been flattened under the present Government. In fact, total investment in 1994 was more than 10 per cent. below its level in 1989, before the recession.

The share of the economy taken by investment has fallen for six years in a row. The average level of investment between 1979 and 1993 as a share of the economy has been the lowest in all the 18 countries of the G7 and the European Community. As the Bank of England pointed out this summer, investment is 20 per cent. below the level that it reached in previous recoveries. I refer to investment in general, to support for investment of the kind sought by the CBI and to investment in education. The Budget told us that funding for education would be as much as local authorities are spending this year, and that there would be cuts in funding for further and higher education and training, including funds for training and education councils.

Nor have the Government protected investment in infrastructure, as the CBI requested. They have savagely cut their own investment, public sector capital spending, with cuts amounting to £3.9 billion by 1997-98. With typical sleight of hand, they have implied that the private finance initiative will fill the gap. It has not so far, and unfortunately it probably will not do so in the future. The Government have already cut their own investment by about £2 billion, and over the same period the private finance initiative has raised only about £500 million. Already, we have a net reduction of £1.5 billion in investment in infrastructure.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): It seems a long time ago, but I seem to remember that the right hon. Lady was a Minister in the last Labour Government. I believe that she was there at the time when the Labour Government cut various forms of public sector capital expenditure by more than any other post-war Government. Does she repent?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman was clearly not awake when I gave the figures for the investment funds that have been available to the present Government. Yes, I do regret the fact that the last Labour Government could not proceed with all their capital spending programmes—although what the Government say about that, like so much of what they say, is often completely untrue. The Secretary of State said, for example, that investment in water had been cut. That is not true. The plans that we hoped to implement were not entirely fulfilled, but investment was not cut; indeed, it rose under the last Labour Government. I suggest that the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) check his facts.

Let me repeat a point that I am happy to repeat—a point that I intend to repeat at every opportunity that I get between now and the next general election. As the Secretary of State did, and as they all do, the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington compared the record of the last Labour Government, who were hit by an oil price increase—[Interruption.] As recently as Tuesday, the Chancellor said that the reason why inflation had gone up a bit this year was an increase in commodity prices. If that excuse is valid for the Chancellor, it must have some relevance to what happened to the last Labour Government. What we never had, and what no Government will ever have again—thanks to the profligacy of the present Government—is £35 million a day of investment to put into the economy.

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: No.

To compare the investment record of the last Labour Government with that of the present Government—even truthfully—is ridiculous. It is not comparing like with like.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: I should like to make progress. I shall give way later if I have time.

What the Government intend is all too clear. I was not able to trace the quotation before today's debate, but I think that I am right in saying that they have implied that the private finance initiative was first introduced to promote the programme of capital investment. It would be used to supplement and extend that programme; the Government denied that it would be used to replace it, and to make up for cuts in Government capital investment. Not only has the latter happened; it has been explicitly advocated—in the Red Book, and in the Chancellor's speech on Tuesday—that the PFI should replace, rather than supplement, public capital investment. That, too, is something that business and industry have sought to avoid.

The Government claim—as they have today—that economic success is already ours, boasting about our trade performance under them. Indeed, that performance has been record-breaking. In 1983, we saw the breaking of an outstanding historical record, with the appearance of the first trade deficit in manufactured goods since the industrial revolution—a record that the Government have managed to maintain every year since then. The trade figures for October reflect another record-breaking Government economic performance—a £1.2 billion non-EC trade deficit. That is the worst figure since the series began.

The balance of UK visible trade in 1994 was a deficit of £10.5 billion, and the balance of trade in manufactured goods showed a deficit of £7.5 billion. We currently have a trading deficit with France, Germany, Italy, Sweden, Denmark and Finland. Incidentally, under the last Labour Government we had an average £4 billion surplus on trade in manufactured goods.

It is hard to see how all that leads the Government to claim that they are making Britain the enterprise centre of Europe. We are down to 18th in the world prosperity league, behind our main European competitors; we are bottom of the league in growth and investment since 1979 among the G7, and 20th out of 24 OECD countries in job creation. It all flies in the face of what the Government say about our economic record, and what they say about jobs—such as the Secretary of State's comment that job insecurity is a state of mind, and that the reality is different. As we pointed out a few days ago, more than 8.5 million people or 26 per cent. of the work force have directly experienced unemployment since the last general election.

Today, we have issued a regional breakdown of those figures that shows that the highest level of unemployment for men was in Greater London at 41 per cent., followed by the northern region at 37 per cent., and then the north-west. Even the best figure, for the south-east excluding London, is 27 per cent.—more than one in four. That is a truly shocking statistic.

The denial of the existence of job insecurity, like the Government's record on tax and public spending and like the Budget, is further evidence of what people are now seeing with greater clarity than ever before. The Government's record is one of dishonesty and sleight of hand. We can see that in the way that they give a little with one hand, but take much more with the other—7p up and 1p down. We can see that in the Government's policies on investment and industry and commerce. We can also see that in what the Government have said about small businesses.

(The Chancellor of the Exchequer) Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The right hon. Lady has returned to the question of taxation and public spending and she has taken the subject rather broadly. Can she give an example of a tax proposal that I have made which the Opposition intend to vote against? Is there an area of public expenditure that the right hon. Lady proposes to increase? If so, will she identify it and say by how much?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) may be in a position at the end of the Budget debate to say how we shall vote on the different resolutions. I have not studied them myself. We shall vote against the overall impact of the Budget. [Interruption.] The Chancellor knows that decisions have to be taken on individual resolutions. [Interruption.] Does the Chancellor want to hear the answer to the question? We do not intend to vote against the cut of 1p in the rate of income tax, because we think that the public have suffered enough thanks to the Government's incompetence and deceit. We intend, however, to vote against the Budget overall.

The Chancellor asked me to identify an area of public spending that should be increased and say whether I would make a commitment to that increase. No, I will not. The Chancellor must know—he always says so himself—that such decisions can be made only in the full knowledge of the facts. The Opposition are able to judge the facts only through the prism of what the Chancellor chooses to tell us. We would be unwise to take his word for anything, as the President of the Board of Trade has demonstrated today by telling us that what his predecessor as President of the Board of Trade said in May and June was absolutely meaningless. That does not encourage anyone to rely on what a Minister says.

Mr. Spring: Answer the question.

Mrs. Beckett: I have already answered the question. The hon. Gentleman is too busy heckling to listen.

The Chancellor raised the VAT threshold for small businesses by only £1,000, less than half the rise necessary to keep pace with inflation. He did not mention that that rise means that 14,000 more small businesses will be drawn into the VAT net over the next three years. He also reduced employers' national insurance contributions by 0.2 per cent., saying that that would "make it cheaper for businesses to create new jobs."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1064.]

However, the savings are so small that only a firm that employs more than 500 people will be able to employ a single extra person. The measure, therefore, does not do anything for small businesses and that is particularly sad because both sides of the House agree that small and medium-sized businesses have the most potential for job creation.

Although the capping of business rate increases for small businesses at 5 per cent. is welcome, the increases are still above the rate of inflation. As always, the best advice for small business people as for everybody else is to read the small print—the Government have a record of giving with one hand and taking back with the other.

The central boast of the Budget is that the Government will make us the enterprise centre of Europe—by cutting investment in infrastructure, and cutting investment in people. That is enough to make a cat laugh, but it will make anybody who cares about our future cry. The Government have betrayed the trust of the British people, robbed them of their inheritance, and jeopardised their future. History will not forgive them, and nor will the people whom they have betrayed.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): No Budget debate would be complete without reference to Iain Macleod's most famous dictum that Budgets that are well received on the day often look different on Second Reading of the Finance Bill; conversely, those that are not well received look rather good by Second Reading. My right hon. and learned Friend's Budget may well be a classic in the second category.

I confess that I was astonished by some of the headlines about the Budget. The Budget is complex and involves many measures, so I think that the press simply did not realise what much of the Budget was about. I feel that the Budget was excellent and well balanced.

The Chancellor was severely limited in what he was able to do. The move towards the 20 per cent. rate of income tax is very important and was approached in three separate ways: by widening the band far more than necessary to keep pace with inflation; by reducing the basic rate—1p off was quite enough, and I have not received a single letter suggesting 2p off; and by the important reduction of the rate of tax to 20 per cent. for people with savings income. That is particularly important for pensioners.

If the Chancellor had gone further, the reaction in the City would have been such that he would not have been able to hold out any prospect of a cut in interest rates, which is likely to be more important to the recovery than anything that appears in the Budget. Despite the stringent attitude that he has taken on public expenditure, a further cut would have had damaging effects. In particular, if the road building programme had been chopped any more, programmes that have already advanced past the public inquiry stage would have been cut, with the consequent waste of nugatory public expenditure. That would be absurd.

The schools programme has provoked great concern in Sussex. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) referred to it earlier. I have had many letters about schools expenditure in West Sussex, rather overlooking the fact that the allocation of resources is for the county council to decide. The Chancellor said:

"The Budget allows for spending on schools to rise next year. We have already increased spending per pupil by some 50 per cent. in real terms since 1979. We devote a higher proportion of our public spending to education than Japan, Germany or France."

He continued, in a crucial passage:

"The plans that I am publishing today allow for an increase in spending on schools of £878 million. Within that, over £770 million will be channelled through the local authority settlement."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1058-59.]

Parents will rightly expect local authorities to carry that funding through to school budgets. They should ask their local authorities how the extra money for schools will be spent on their children. West Sussex county council, which is Liberal controlled, has been diverting money from education to its particular hobby horses and has then asked people to write to me to ask why education spending has been cut.

The expenditure side of the Budget is thus well balanced and it should be welcomed by the whole House.

When the Leader of the Opposition spoke after the Budget statement, his catch phrase was that the Government were giving with one hand and taking with the other—by contrast with the Labour party, which would take with one hand and give with the other. However, it would be a very strange Budget that took with one hand and did not give anything, or vice versa. Why the Opposition have latched on to that extraordinary catch phrase is mystifying.

I was intrigued by the emphasis that the Leader of the Opposition put on the fact that Conservatives are now writing to him. I had an extraordinary experience on my interview night the Friday before last when a constituent told me, "I wrote to the Prime Minister and got a reply from the Leader of the Opposition." I looked into the matter and that is what happened. I am still trying to get the letter back from the files of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, in so as far as the Leader of the Opposition had a catch phrase, it was, "7p up and 1p down"? Will he comment on that?

Sir Terence Higgins: The Leader of the Opposition should look at the entire period of Conservative government and, in particular, at what has happened to the real incomes and take-home pay of various individuals in different categories. One has to look at the Government's performance and, in terms of raising living standards—allowing for tax changes, inflation and everything else—it has been a remarkably good record. If I may say so, the catch phrase that has been bandied about is rather silly.

Let me refer also to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). The gimmick of a 10p tax band is totally divorced from the width of the band. Would it apply to the first £1 of income or the first £60,000? The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) is muttering to herself. Perhaps she can tell me how wide the band is. Without that information, it is a totally meaningless statement. It does not mean anything to promise a 10p band of income tax at the starting rate. In any case, that is not an efficient way of reducing tax. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has done more to help people at the bottom end of the scale by raising the basic allowance.

I happened to catch the tail end of the Budget broadcast by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East last night. He stressed the importance of honesty in tax policies. He floated a remark about cutting VAT on fuel, but made no reference to the fact that under European legislation, the most he could cut VAT is from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent. His so-called honest broadcast gave the impression that there would be a massive cut or probably the abolition of VAT on fuel, so that did not seem very honest.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): We are interested in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman as he is a former Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said not that he would reduce VAT from 8 per cent. to zero, but that he wished to reduce VAT on fuel from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent.

Sir Terence Higgins: Quite so. If that is what the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said, I accept it as I heard only the end of the broadcast. If that is so, I apologise.

Having said that, I believe that the basic arrangements that were made for pensioners and those on social security benefit when we put VAT on fuel were beneficial. Unless the hon. Gentleman wishes to go further than he went last night and promises to reduce the rate of VAT on fuel and retain the compensation that the Conservative Government gave to those on low incomes and pensioners, his proposals were not entirely clear.

I now come to that old-fashioned expression, the Budget judgment, which has not been dealt with adequately. The PSBR has declined rather more slowly than we had hoped, because there has been some slow-down in the economy and consequentially, revenues have not risen as fast as they might have done and unemployment has not fallen as fast as we had hoped. That being so, the action that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has taken in regard to the PSBR is not inappropriate at this stage in the economic cycle. The rate of growth in the economy was lower than we had expected, so there is a case for running a level of PSBR that stimulates the economy. Therefore, I view the present level of the PSBR with relative equanimity. Inflation is clearly well under control and it is important to strike the right balance between controlling inflation and economic growth. Again, my right hon. and learned Friend got that pretty well right.

I return to my earlier point about the rate of interest. Had my right hon. and learned Friend increased interest rates, as the Governor of the Bank of England appeared to advocate some while ago, the PSBR would have been larger, so my right hon. and learned Friend was right to resist that and to emphasise the rate of interest as well as fiscal policy.

We have to put the Budget in a European context. In respect of the PSBR, I am worried about the enormous pressure to meet the convergence criteria under the Maastricht treaty. There are some real problems as they do not take into account the stage of the economic cycle in any particular country and it seems dangerous to say that it is suddenly all right at any particular moment. If the criteria are to mean anything at all, they have to be at a sustainable level, when the PSBR is consistent with moving a further stage towards economic and monetary union.

Mr. Stern: Does my right hon. Friend agree that another difficulty is that the Maastricht criteria for borrowing take no account whatever of the national assets against which the borrowing is undertaken, so in comparing borrowing rates in different countries, they totally ignore the capacity to borrow?

Sir Terence Higgins: Yes, indeed. It may well be that borrowing is an appropriate response at certain stages in the economic cycle, depending on the level of capital expenditure on which the Opposition are so keen.

The general pressure now being exerted in Britain and throughout Europe is extremely dangerous because it may well have a recessionary effect. Again, one has to balance the difference between the size of the deficits and the state of the cycle. I view with relative equanimity the action that my right hon. and learned Friend has taken. Of course, he is right to seek to reduce the public sector deficit. That must be appropriate, but perhaps the sense of urgency in some quarters has been somewhat overdone.

Overall, this is a well-balanced Budget, which should result in greater appreciation as the weeks go by and we debate the Finance Bill. It is a particularly good Budget from my constituency point of view. It is a good Budget for pensioners, for Worthing, for the economy and for Britain.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): I shall give just a few reflections. I concede in a fairly broad-brush way on the Budget, and I hope that I follow in the spirit of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), who is a distinguished former Treasury Minister and who gave a balanced view of the Budget speech.

Clearly, all Budgets are not simply exercises in economics, otherwise we would have simply a conclave of learned professors who would give us of their views. Different Budgets have different admixtures of economics and politics. I suspect that the fear of this year's Budget was that, as we approached a general election season, politics would be even more paramount than they are in most Budgets. This year's Budget has to be viewed more than most in the context of its timing, the state of the country and the state of the Government.

The Budget speech, which now seems so long ago, met with rather different receptions on both sides of the House. I concede straight away that the dominant response among the Opposition, including myself, was relief because we have a keen appreciation of the Chancellor's political skills and, right until the end, we assumed that something dramatic would be pulled out of the hat, which might rescue the fortunes of his party and begin to restore a feel-good factor, even at this relatively late stage.

Our relief was expressed by, "Is that all?" There was certainly a feeling of relief on the Opposition Benches. We have, of course, respect for the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a political animal. We recognise also that he is a moderate man in a party that is becoming increasingly immoderate. The Conservative party is becoming increasingly hostile to Europe. We know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has great experience and relative wisdom and seeks to avoid the essays in populism that the Home Secretary is wont to take.

I suspect that there was disappointment on the Government Benches. There was probably a feeling of great gloom. Drowning men and women were hoping that a lifebelt would be thrown to them. At the end of the Chancellor's statement, they realised that it would not be forthcoming.

In reality, we were presented with a relatively prudent Budget. Perhaps that was necessarily so. However great the temptation to be reckless, the Chancellor was mightily boxed in by economic realities. He was, for example, boxed in by the less buoyant revenues that he had not anticipated. He was boxed in also because the public sector borrowing requirement was greater than had been forecast and anticipated. His room for manoeuvre was far less than he would have wished at this stage of the political cycle.

It is only fair to say that there were a number of positive elements in the Budget. For example, it was relatively green in that it was to some extent environmentally friendly. Some of the key concerns of the average citizen were at least recognised, if not addressed. I am thinking of the priorities of public expenditure, including education, to which the right hon. Member for Worthing referred. On the basis of, "Now you see it, now you don't," I suspect that much of the so-called increased expenditure on education will evaporate rather rapidly when the figures are examined in detail.

We know that there is a crisis within the national health service. Only about 10 days ago the local newspaper in my constituency, which is not a traditional Labour party supporter, carried a headline to the effect that there is such a crisis. The article set out a series of major failures in health provision. The people know that and they recognise it. We know, of course, that there are some objective factors and increased pressures, which we all face. Many of the problems, however, result from the Government's ideological frolics.

Most Members recognise that law and order comes high on our constituents' agenda. We ignore the issue at our peril. It is suggested that an additional 5,000 police officers will be made available. That increase is only to be welcomed. Training will take some time, however, and there will be no immediate effect. There will be no political effect, apart from the declaratory effect, before the next election. There will be no fifth cavalry appearance out of the sunset to help the Government.

The Budget statement contained the recognition at last that something had to be done about the costs incurred by those who move into long-stay residential homes. Most of our people recognise that there is gross unfairness in the system. The Government's recognition of the problem must be welcomed.

Unfortunately, there were several regressive elements in the Budget. I have in mind the overall impact on the richest 10 per cent. of the population and on the poorest 10 per cent., and the punishing of victims in our society—for example, the swipe at single mothers and the reduction in housing benefit payments for those under 25 years of age. It is clear that the Government are labouring under a misapprehension. It seems that they think that youngsters leave their homes because they want to or because there are bosoms of families to which they can return if housing benefit is reduced.

The reality is that we live in an increasingly fragmented society. Much social distress will be caused by the reduction in housing benefit for the under-25s. I do not make the dramatic claim that we shall see a great expansion of cardboard cities. It is true, however, that young people at a vulnerable age, suffering from a lack of job opportunities, will find it increasingly difficult to find the few jobs that are available if they do not have steady addresses. The Government's action is deplorable. They may try to justify it according to their preconceptions, but their action does not tally with social and economic realities. I hope that they will reflect on the way in which the vulnerable are being penalised.

There are evasions within the Budget. It is clear that council tax will increase. The Government will seek to throw the blame for policy failures on local councils. After the previous round of local elections, councils are under the control of the Labour party or Liberal party, or in some instances there is mixed control that has resulted in Lib-Lab coalitions.

The electorate will not fall for the blame that the Government will throw on councils. The Government may wish to make local councils unpopular by causing them to increase council tax in the next settlement. That is the assumption in Wales, but there is hardly a Conservative councillor left in Wales. A few years ago, Cardiff city council had a Conservative majority. It now has only one Conservative councillor. Swansea has only one Conservative councillor, as has Newport. If, as is assumed, council tax had to be increased by about 11 per cent., it would be easy, with an unsophisticated electorate, to point the finger of blame at the councils. The Government will not succeed in that approach, however hard they try.

The Budget contains wrong priorities. I shall not repeat what I said yesterday about the World Service. It is a unique service. Its capital budget has been reduced by 20 per cent. It is clear that the Government have not appreciated the value of the service. Not too many years ago, I was sitting on a one-to-one basis with the President of a major African country. He told me that he listened to the World Service for his news. He relied on the service for that information. So many opinion formers, people whom we need to address and cultivate, rely on the quality of the service. The Government's cutting of capital provision is bound to have an adverse effect on quality of service at a time of much greater competition.

The Government say that there will be a 20 per cent. reduction in funding, but that that may be compensated by the private finance initiative. They say that the private sector may be able to move in to fill the gap that has been left by the withdrawal of public expenditure. That is no more than a hope. It may happen or it may not. Everything depends on the private sector's response.

That same hope is found in a number of other areas, such as the NHS and the assumption that the private sector will be prepared to make up the shortfall in the public provision of capital for the NHS. That may or may not be so, but it savours of a sleight of hand.

[Mr. Donald Anderson]

The inheritance tax measure is another wrong priority. It may be that the threshold should have gone up marginally, but for it to go up by almost £50,000 is excessive, particularly when something in respect of VAT on fuel would have been a proper priority. Even a reduction from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent., which is permissible, would have relieved poverty, targeting those who most need the reduction.

Sir Terence Higgins: That is the point that I was making. For pensioners and people in need, the amount of compensation in many cases, and perhaps even overall, has more than compensated for the tax.

Mr. Anderson: Of course, there is a compensation scheme for certain elements, but there are those at the margins whom, in other contexts, the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues would seek to support, who will lose out as a result of the failure to reduce the current 8 per cent. to 5 per cent.

I shall not go over the missed opportunity on the windfall tax. But the way in which the leaders of the privatised utilities, doing largely the same jobs as they did before, imagine that their saleability, their market worth, in the private sector has been so mightily enhanced, must be an embarrassment to the Government. It is an affront to the great mass of reasonable people in Britain, and the Government are, in essence, doing nothing about it.

I end on this note. Historically, the Budget will be seen largely as a non-event. The Conservative party is really two parties. It is a highly divided party. The Government have been drifting ever since they were forced out of the exchange rate mechanism. We recall the bitter speech of the then retiring Chancellor, in which he talked of a Government in office but not in power. The Government have been in office, enjoying the fruits of office and exulting in the trappings of office, since that time, but they are not in power because of those divisions. The resulting drift is bad for the country. We saw that in the Queen's Speech in 1994. Once Post Office privatisation was taken out of the equation we, as legislators, had perhaps the easiest year in my memory in the House.

This Queen's Speech, apart from the scattering of populist elements, such as the asylum Bill, is, relatively, a non-event. I can think of no historical precedent save the staleness of 1819, when Shelley, in his poem about the state of the nation, wrote about "An old, mad, blind, despised, and dying king".

That is the only precedent for a Government who have run out of steam, who are tired, who have no vision, who are drifting and who should go.

7.2 pm

Sir John Cope (Northavon): It would be nice at this stage of the Budget debate to be able to compare and contrast the proposals of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the Opposition's proposals. Unfortunately, we cannot do that, because there is none, apart from the windfall tax which, as far as I could gather from the speech of the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), was somehow a response to executive share options, and so on, in the privatised utilities, which seemed rather surprising.

I welcome the Budget although, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), I was rather surprised by the press reaction to it. I read in the paper that Tory Members of Parliament were disappointed and thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have gone further. In many conversations with colleagues around the House since the Budget, I have not found that to be the case. It was a steady Budget and right for the economy, and will help the country to continue the steady expansion that we are enjoying.

I welcome the Budget particularly from the point of view of small businesses. They are, as my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade said, crucial to the country's economy. They are the dynamic sector of the economy, they fill niches all over the marketplace, they are generally very flexible and they are, crucially, where jobs come from these days.

There are some specific measures in the Budget for small businesses, to which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade referred, which I welcome—for example, additional relief for business rates. The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) seemed rather to dismiss that, but it is worth £300 million over three years and so should not be dismissed. There were also retirement relief and inheritance tax measures and another small lift in the VAT threshold.

I would like to see the VAT threshold higher. I am glad to say that when I was in the Treasury the threshold was considerably increased by a large jump. We are inhibited in the amount by which we can increase it further as a result of our agreements in the European Community, but that is desirable.

The most important thing for small businesses is not so much the specific measures, important as they are, but the overall effect of the Budget. Small businesses need an increase in demand, in consumers ready to spend money in order to increase their turnovers. The Budget will help with that to some extent by encouraging growth.

But the Budget also looks as though it will mean lower interest rates. I gather that at least three building societies have lowered their interest rates and more are likely to follow. That too is important.

Crucially for small businesses, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor also outlined in his Budget speech several measures aimed at simplification and deregulation. They are part of an important series of initiatives to which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade referred. I know well from my experience in government how difficult simplification of the tax system and deregulation are in practice. But they are of fundamental importance and so worth the great effort that is required.

Every business has to deal not only with the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise, which we are mainly discussing in the Budget debate, but with a series of different Government and local government departments and agencies. I counted a total of 23 regulatory agencies covering one small ordinary business, not at all in a specialist line.

The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are only two of those, although a business often, indeed usually, has to deal with more than one part of, for example, the Inland Revenue. It has to deal with PAYE for its employees, and with corporation tax and the calculation of profits, and so on, which involves another part of the Inland Revenue. In effect, the Inland Revenue is two bodies.

Therefore, one of the most valuable sentences in the Budget speech occurs, appropriately enough, in column 1066. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor said:

"The Inland Revenue will shortly be publishing a report on tax simplification."

That was not news; it is under an obligation to do so next month, as we know from the last Finance Act. My right hon. and learned Friend added:

"We shall propose that the Revenue tax code is to be rewritten in plain English".

When I was responsible for Customs and Excise, I am glad to say that it won some plain English awards for some of its leaflets, which was very good. We also started a drive to make VAT more taxpayer friendly—if that is not an impossible task. My right hon. and learned Friend went on to say:

"We in the House will need to look at our procedures, to see how that tax rewrite can be sensibly handled."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1066.]

In that sentence I saw a reflection of the work that has been done by the tax law review committee of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, which published an interim report a few days ago. It is a most interesting report and it deserves the closest study. It reinforces strongly the complex web that constitutes our tax legislation now; I admit at once to having contributed to that as a Treasury Minister, with some of the longest Finance Bills that there have been. But I also know how difficult it is for the professions—let alone the small business man trying to understand what is required of him—to deal with the tax legislation. The report makes it clear how difficult the problem is, both in what it says and in the solutions that it proposes, but nevertheless that only increases its importance in my view.

The passage on parliamentary handling of such changes is of interest to us, but particularly to me because I am now on the Procedure Committee. The simplification that is required is partly of language, but it cannot be done without at least some changes to the substance of the legislation itself, and so our consolidation Bill procedures cannot be used as they are now in the Standing Orders of the House. In any case, of course, they were not designed for that purpose and would not really be appropriate. The volume of tax legislation is now so huge that to rewrite it would require a mammoth Finance Bill or, more realistically, a set of them. We need to think carefully about the parliamentary angle and desirable changes in the tax law before we get much further. The IFS report discusses it all and is most valuable, but it is important to keep up the momentum, so I welcome very much column 1066 of the Budget speech.

I wish to discuss another matter that is related in a sense. One way in which my right hon. and learned Friend might have gone—and was urged to go by many people—was down the road of reintroducing investment allowances. There was a lot of prompting for him to do that, from many sources—indeed, I passed on some of it to Treasury Ministers myself—but I believe that it would be a retrograde step and would not help investment. Investment allowances are a political flag to wave, a way to say that something is being done about investment without having a significant effect on investment itself, and with the great drawback of adding further complications to the tax system, which is something that I wish to avoid.

My generation of accountants was brought up on very elaborate capital allowances, which altered almost every year as Chancellors of the Exchequer—of all parties—tried to encourage investment in particular assets. Over the years, we had initial allowances, investment allowances, free depreciation, investment grants and so on, all coming in and out of operation in different years. They varied between different assets: industrial buildings, plant and machinery, motor cars, ships with refrigeration equipment, ships without, all that sort of thing. Drawing offices counted as industrial buildings provided that they were attached to a factory, but not if they were not. Retail premises or showrooms were not allowable as an industrial building unless they were under 10 per cent. of the square footage. The rules always varied, not only from year to year but from place to place, as Chancellors tried to help the areas of high unemployment.

All that caused a great deal of activity for junior accountancy clerks like me, but I do not believe that it made a significant difference to the total investment, although it succeeded in moving the investment around the country in some cases. I believe that it also had some unintended side effects, for example, on the sale of agricultural tractors, which, for some years, was enormous and not really justified. The fact is that businesses invest when they can afford to do so, and in projects that they think worth while. I believe that they are the best judges of whether it is better to invest in a new machine, showroom, both, or something else. Interest rates and the examination of what they will be during the life of the asset or investment concerned have a big effect on whether they can afford it, because a lot of investment is done on borrowed money. In that respect, the Budget is helpful from the investment point of view as well as otherwise.

Expectation of demand is the biggest factor in whether the proposed investment is likely to be worth while. That, too, is helped by the Budget. Both factors mean that it is a good Budget for investment, and it is far better than it would have been if we had gone back to the complicated system of investment allowances, which would have been a big step backwards in the simplification of the tax system that I want to see.

Overall, I think that it is a good Budget, which I very much welcome.

7.15 pm

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): If I said that the Budget was a missed opportunity, I would mean something very different from the many Conservative Members who might share those sentiments, judging by the picture of their faces as the Chancellor sat down at the end of his speech. I noted with interest that two Conservative Members declared surprise at the reactions in the newspapers the next morning, but if they had had the advantage of viewing the body language, faces and expressions of hon. Members on the Government Benches as the Chancellor sat down, and had been able to contrast those with the expressions on the faces of hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, they would have understood only too clearly why the editors the following morning also saw it as a missed opportunity for the Conservative party.

But my meaning is rather different. The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), who spoke for the Opposition, rightly and with great precision outlined the vast sums that have been blown by the Government in recent years. In particular, she catalogued the proceeds of the privatisations and added them to the North sea oil revenues, quoting both at current day prices and pointing out that they had not been used in a prudent way or to invest in the longer term. I find it remarkable that the Conservative party, which has often lectured us about the merits of good housekeeping, has found it fit to squander that money, not on capital expenditure, not on investment for the future, but on an orgy of current expenditure, most notably in the consumer boom of the late 1980s and also to fund tax cuts, which time and again have been reversed afterwards by one means or another.

When one looks at the overall state of the nation's finances, as quoted in the back-up figures to the Budget, one can see that public sector borrowing is vastly higher for the current year and for the next than the level that was quoted just a year ago in the Budget. The Government are borrowing more heavily, not to invest in the future, in capital expenditure, but to pay for the tax cut that they have used as a gimmick, which they had hoped would be of some political benefit and a salvation to them.

Another disappointment of the Budget is that some of the areas of expenditure that have been cut—which, perhaps, have not yet been highlighted to the extent that they deserve, but which will emerge over the coming weeks and months—will in some cases prove very damaging. I should like for a few moments to highlight new house building. It can be seen from the Budget that new house building will be cut in the coming year. The Government originally promised that there would be £1.5 billion for new homes next year. That has now been cut to less than £1.1 billion. So the number of new homes that will be started will drop by more than half—from 76,000 to 41,000. When one looks at what the Government's own figures suggest will be the need for new housing during the coming year, one can see that the total number of lettings that housing associations will be able to undertake—both the new build and the other forms of housing that they are able to make available—will be around only half of what the Government acknowledge could be needed in the coming year.

Of course, as well as the impact on housing provision, it is well known to all hon. Members that the number of people out of work in the construction industry remains alarmingly high. It is down somewhat from the high of 500,000, but is still unacceptably high. All those people have to be paid benefits and are not contributing anything back in the way of tax revenue to the Government. That is costing the nation a great deal at a time when there is a need for new housing.

In my region, the south-west, the number of houses that housing associations can start next year will fall from nearly 7,000, as the Government first promised, to about half that figure—3,500. Not only will unemployed construction workers in mine and the neighbouring constituencies not be given the opportunity to get back to work and do something useful, but many of my constituents who are in need of housing will not have that need met. That is not unique to my area or to north Devon. A survey of Members of Parliament showed that housing was singled out as the biggest issue in Members' postbags. Two thirds of Conservative Members and all Labour Members agreed that there was a shortage of available rented accommodation in their constituencies.

A heaven-sent opportunity to deal with that serious problem is being wasted so that money is available for a tax cut in the Budget. That is very nice for those who are in a position to enjoy it, but it is not of much benefit to those on low incomes who do not even pay tax and are without homes. The Budget could have done something concrete to promote house building and tackle that problem.

Much has been said about the private finance initiative. House building is one of the areas in which it has been deemed to be a success. It has been possible for housing associations to attract private funding to match pound for pound the public moneys that they have been putting into new house building. In addition to the £450 million of public funding that will be lost, a further £450 million of private funding, which could have been attracted through the PFI, will also be lost. That is nothing short of a scandal and it is one of the several stories that will emerge after time and after people have had the opportunity to look at the finer print of the Budget and see some of the real damage that is going to be done in many parts of the economy to pay for the 1p tax cut.

This afternoon, there have been discussions about measures to help businesses and small businesses. There have been some in the Budget and it would be churlish not to acknowledge them. None the less it remains a fact that all those referred to are too modest. It is welcome that employers' national insurance is down from 10.2 per cent. to 10 per cent., but this hardly seems to be the occasion to raise the flags and celebrate. It needs to go a good deal further than that.

Further relief against the increases in business rates for small businesses is welcome, but even after that many small businesses in the south-west and elsewhere will find the rate that they are expected to pay cripplingly high and a major problem as they try to steer their way out of the recession. There can be few regions of the country that have suffered quite as badly on the business rate as the south-west.

The fact that small firms will also face a lower corporation tax bill in the coming year is also welcome. While the small increase in the value added tax threshold is welcome, however, many small businesses are desperate for fundamental reform of the VAT system.

I do not pretend for one moment that a magic wand can be waved to put that right automatically, but some acknowledgement by the Government that much further reform of the system is necessary would be welcome.

The right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) chose to refer to the moneys which, during his speech on Tuesday, the Chancellor led everyone to believe would be available for education in the coming year. Education should be a top priority for investment because it is unquestionably investment in the future. If we are to tackle the long-term spiral of decline, there can be no better way of setting about that task than bringing about real improvements in our education system and in the facilities in which those working and learning in the system find themselves trying to cope every day.

On hearing the Chancellor's remarks, I like many others genuinely thought that he was making £878 million of new money available to education, of which £770 million would be channelled through the local authorities. Like everyone else, on studying the finer detail of the Budget, I was surprised to find that the central Government settlement to local authorities for the coming year is to increase by a mere 3.3 per cent., which is broadly in line with inflation, and that the money that was supposedly being earmarked for education does not exist.

Local authorities are invited to spend that additional money on education, but are not given the means to do so. They have to make a choice. They either cut other services that they are responsible for providing, which means that they will have to cut road repairs, libraries and personal social services, which are already strained to the limit as they struggle with the task of implementing the community care programme; or, if they cannot find any way of cutting other services, they will have to raise the council tax to pay for the education package.

It is interesting to find in the Red Book that the Government anticipate as part of this Budget that councils will have to increase council tax by three times the rate of inflation. When councils set their budgets next April and May and find themselves driven to do so, one can confidently anticipate the cries from Conservative Members who receive letters from constituents complaining about the rise. They will say, "Look at this. Liberal Democrat and Labour councils are increasing the council tax." They will not be able to point to any Conservative councils doing it because there is none left.

People must understand that that is what the Conservatives have been anticipating from the word go. The whole thing is an elaborate deception. They have given the impression that the money is there, but it is not.

Mr. Stern: The hon. Gentleman claims, with what justification I am not sure—my hon. Friend the Minister will make that clear in her reply—that it is assumed that the council tax will rise by a rate three times higher than inflation. As a citizen of Bristol, I can tell him that if the council tax were to rise by a mere three times the rate of inflation, it would be a blessed relief to the citizens of that city.

Mr. Harvey: I am not sure whether other citizens of the city would, necessarily agree with the hon. Gentleman's blase attitude. I do not think that council tax payers will find it remotely acceptable that they are asked to pay three times the rate of inflation. When they remember that the Chancellor promised this great sum for education, it will be interesting to be able to tell them that the very Budget that included the supposed provision of that extra money had assumed all along that the increase in council tax would have to be three times the rate of inflation and that only by means of such a rise were the Government able to quote that notional figure in the first place.

If the Government had simply said that they were giving local authorities a settlement for next year of 3.3 per cent., which is broadly in line with inflation, there would have been relatively little argument or cause to demur. Of course, there would have been some proper but predictable complaints about higher pupil numbers, the extra tasks that local authorities were being asked to undertake and the fact that they had not been taken into account in a settlement that was only in line with inflation. But, broadly speaking, everybody would have found such a settlement more or less reasonable.

Apparently, however, the Government could not confine themselves to making such a statement. They had to pretend that a vast extra sum was being made available for education, which is not the case. It was an elaborate piece of deception, but I do not believe that they will succeed in pulling the wool over the eyes of council tax payers.

The Government suffered bad bruising last year in the battle over local authority finance, which resulted in many Conservative councillors losing their seats in last May's local elections. Some of those councillors had given many years' good service to their communities and did not deserve to lose their seats, but they were driven into that situation by the cavalier and cack-handed manner in which central Government administer local authority finance.

Exactly the same will happen next May. I predict with confidence that there will be massive casualties on the Conservative side in the local authority elections. And Conservative councillors will know exactly whom to blame—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for the Environment. They are the people who pulled that ridiculous scam that will fool nobody, and which will not only have a devastating effect on our education services but will result in catastrophe for the Conservatives next May.

One thing above all else distinguishes our party's position from that of the Government: we have said all along that we believe that the equivalent of 1p in the pound in income tax should be spent on education. That is real money—£2 billion, three times the sum the Government pretend they are making available.

Mr. Spring: Does the Liberal Democratic party propose to ring-fence the much vaunted 1p increase in income tax to ensure that the money is spent on education, or will it simply be paid through the block grant to local government?

Mr. Harvey: It is certainly our intention that that money will be an extra grant on top of the block grant that is paid in the normal way, and that it should be available specifically for spending on education.

Polling evidence has found that that was the single most popular policy of any party at the general election. That is why we shall say again to the public next week that we have been consistent, and that we still believe that the equivalent of 1p in the pound on income tax should be spent on education. We do not believe it right or proper at this time for the Government to borrow yet more heavily in order to give out a 1p tax cut.

[Mr. Harvey]

In the Lobby next week we shall have no hesitation in voting against that wholly irresponsible, uncalled for, unwarranted cut in income tax when there is such a demand and such a need for investment in our future, and for making our children's education a top priority. That would avoid the terrible scenes that we saw last winter as well as the situation this year, when most local authorities have had to start the autumn term with higher pupil numbers but, in many cases, with hundreds fewer teachers.

7.32 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I start, as so many of my hon. Friends have done, by congratulating my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor and his Treasury colleagues on the prudence of the Budget.

The day before the Budget, there was great concern, largely whipped up by the media, that there would be a huge giveaway. Indeed, it was the Conservative supporters to whom I spoke who said that they hoped that the Budget would be not the sort of Budget that they were reading about in the media, but the sort of prudent Budget that they would expect from my right hon. and learned Friend—and that was what they got. Certainly a Budget that matches the necessary tax cuts with equivalent reductions in public spending cannot be described as other than prudent.

My concerns about the Budget go a little further than those of many of my hon. Friends in that, although I accept that it was the right shape, I wonder whether it was prudent enough. When a nation is borrowing more than £1 billion every fortnight to finance public spending, there is a strong argument for saying that further cuts in public spending should have been found, and that the Chancellor should at least have presented more strongly the case that the cuts that had been found should have gone directly into reducing the public sector borrowing requirement.

It is not so long since the years between 1987 and 1991—four years in which the public sector outturn was £3.5 billion, £14.7 billion, £8 billion and £0.6 billion. Having given those figures, I am afraid that I must admit to cheating a little in one respect—they were not public sector borrowing requirements but repayments of public debt.

In those four years, a Conservative Government succeeded in doing what few if any other Governments have succeeded in doing in the past 100 years—they managed public sector finances so as to repay national debt. That not only reduced the burden on future generations in terms of repayment requirements, but reduced annually the burden of interest on future annual current accounts.

I am therefore a little worried that the Chancellor's announced plans for management of the public sector balances over the next few years tend only towards a balance in the medium term. That worries me not only because I am an accountant, and practised full time as one for many years before I entered the House, but because I know that, for any business to attempt to break even, it must aim firmly at making a profit.

If the Chancellor is attempting to reach break-even on the public sector finances by 2000, I should like more strenuous attempts to be made, by reducing public expenditure further, to achieve public sector debt repayment, which the Government achieved in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

The right public sector borrowing requirement at any particular time is a matter over which economists can argue—and frequently do. It cannot be arrived at simply by comparing one country with another. It is not, perhaps, surprising that our achievement last year in terms of public sector net borrowing as a percentage of GDP was considerably worse than Germany's—I suppose that that is what one would have expected—but it was considerably better than that of Italy. That, too, is probably what one would have expected, but I was a little surprised to find that our performance was quite a bit worse than that of France.

Compared with our non-European Union competitors, the situation is a little more worrying. As a percentage of GDP, the general balance of United Kingdom finances was considerably worse than those of both the United States and Japan. Even that is only a guide, because to work out how much a country should borrow in any year, one must take into account the financial position of that country at that particular time and, as I said during the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), the asset base against which the borrowing has been made.

In the 1980s, it was frequently said—with considerable justification—that Britain's borrowing capacity, and the reason why Britain's currency was so strong during the height of our borrowing in the 1980s as well as when we were repaying the national debt, was the strength of British assets abroad, against which, effectively, the world's financial markets were judging our borrowing. I wonder whether the same would be true today. While our borrowing is coming down—and will continue to come down in the next few years—it is considerably higher than it was in the 1980s. As the mobility of international privately owned assets has become greater and as more and more of the world's economies have become market economies rather than controlled economies, the skip to and fro of assets has become easier.

I suspect that a banker running his eye over the balance sheet of United Kingdom plc would come to two conclusions. First, there is a great danger of the United Kingdom—to use an accounting phrase—over-trading at current levels in relation to its asset base. Secondly, that asset base might in any case have been significantly eroded in Government terms since the 1980s, when it was last measured.

The effect is considerable worry in two respects. First, the current plan is for the PSBR only to reach a balance. In other words, on the declared plans of my right hon. and learned Friend, not 1p of what we are now borrowing is intended to be repaid in the medium term. It is all there as a burden for future generations. Secondly, we have not abolished the world's economic cycles. We all know that what turned our public sector debt repayment of the late 1980s and early 1990s into the PSBR was the world recession, which forced us to increase public spending on cyclical items such as unemployment benefit and income support. The recession resulted in our previously sound public finances falling into the worrying position in which we now find them.

If one talks to those in the business community—they are currently enjoying reasonable growth and have been doing so for the past couple of years—there is little doubt that the next world recession will come. What frightens me is the growing consensus among economists and business men that, as the world's trading nations have increased, the vulnerability of the world economy has also increased. The economic cycles are also speeding up.

Most of the economists and business men who are being asked to put a date on the visible start of the next world recession are plumping for a date around the turn of the century. That, of course, is the period during which—under the Chancellor's present plans—it is intended that British public sector finances will get closer to balance.

My fear is that, as we approach a worse position in the public sector than we had in the 1980s, we shall enter another recession. That recession will cause us to start increasing public sector borrowing again without having had any opportunity to repay what we have borrowed. Inevitably that will have an impact not only on the vulnerability of the British economy to future world cycles, but on the debt burden and interest burden that we are leaving to subsequent generations. In the long run, it will have an impact on the expected life styles and standards of living of the generations for whom we are now providing in our management of the public sector.

The conclusion that I have reached reluctantly—which I have been considering for some time—is that, in our broad pattern of public sector spending, we have in many areas developed champagne tastes on what remains a beer income. In the next few years, we need to start putting before the public the possibility that a number of what appear to be permanent public spending programmes might need to be looked at again.

A banker looking at the British balance sheet—but not taking into account other factors such as social acceptability—would probably advise a reduction in expenditure of about £30 billion on permanent programmes over the lifetime of this business cycle. That is a far larger reduction than has been contemplated either in this Budget or in alternative budgets such as those put forward by the Conservative 2000 Foundation.

Such a measure would involve reducing many programmes which people regard as foundations of the welfare state. It would involve, for example, looking seriously at whether we can continue to pay child benefit above income support levels. It would involve looking seriously—as I believe the Government should—at the range of exemptions from prescription charges and at the level of those charges. It could be possible both to lower the level and to increase the exemptions while saving a considerable sum in public spending. It might even involve—to howls of protest—looking at whether a non-funded basic state retirement pension should be paid to those on upper incomes.

Such a measure would involve looking at the scope of the NHS to see whether it is capable of taking on the demands that are currently made of it, and the demands that will inevitably be made of it in the future in the light of shifting scientific research, the availability of medical treatments and the demands that people inevitably make once they know that such treatments are available. This and many more areas are not currently being looked at.

There is an absence of any realistic alternative from any other party in the House because—let us face it—there is no point in discussing public expenditure reductions with the Opposition because they do not even understand the meaning of the term. I believe that the British nation will, in the next few years, look to the House and the Government to consider matters of this nature. It is not sufficient simply to solve the financial problems of today by pushing them on to future generations.

Clearly it will be necessary to look at this Budget in the context of my right hon. and learned Friend's next Budget which he will deliver, in my view, in November 1996. I believe that it will be necessary to consider what scope there is in the long term for public expenditure reductions, because only if we can begin to educate the British public about the need for public expenditure reductions of the order that I have outlined will we be able to set up for the future a sound public sector financial system that does not leave unacceptable burdens for future generations.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): I am very pleased to follow the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), and I was struck by his simile "champagne tastes on a beer budget". I hope that he will forgive me if I say to the House that I think a more correct simile from him would have been "caviar on a fish and chip income". The hon. Gentleman will recall the occasion to which I am referring.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) touched earlier upon one aspect of the Budget that has not been given much attention—the environmental sensitivity, or greenness, of the Budget. I am struck by the Budget proposal to take the income from the landfill tax while reducing national insurance. It is a switch from a tax on labour to a tax on pollution, which is a significant move. I look forward to future Budgets, perhaps introduced by a different Government, that will treat that move as a touchstone because we could do more of this.

The Budget maintains the difference between leaded and unleaded petrol, which is an input tax. I am more interested in output taxes. I am confident that, with increasing technology, we shall soon be able to measure the pollution from vehicles. I want the pollution from vehicles to be taxed as an alternative.

VAT on fuel has been discussed tonight. Hon. Members will remember that, in the discussions and arguments on that subject in the House over recent months, one justification for VAT on fuel was that it drove down consumption and thus helped save the planet. But it does not because VAT on fuel takes no recognisance of the fact that electricity comes from different sources. We should consider that fact as another future Budget measure. I find it amazing that at Drax and Radcliffe power stations, for example, flue gas desulphurisation equipment has been fitted. The cost at Drax was £700 million. The consequence of generating electricity at those retro-fitted plants is that the cost of electricity is slightly higher. Moreover, the added costs at those stations reduce the stations' competitiveness in the pool to such an extent that, at certain times of the year, dirtier polluting stations come on line before them. That is clearly crazy. A Budget measure that we should strive for in the future is to give a green premium—a credit—for green electricity.

These are challenging and difficult arguments and I look forward to working on them and making environmental taxation a way of enhancing the environment and, as my children would say, saving the planet.

The Budget contained other environmental issues. We have been constantly challenged to say where the Opposition would make savings. Let me give one example. I note that the countryside stewardship scheme, which is designed to protect wildlife and enhance the countryside, is to be transferred to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 1 April next year. That budget will increase next year by £5 million.

I am a strong supporter of countryside stewardship as it lifts the landscape and protects the countryside, but I am unhappy about one aspect of it: the payment to landowners for allowing public access, which is part of the scheme. I have done some research on this and I acknowledge the work that the Ramblers Association has done. It found that 44 per cent. of the sites that receive public access money already have access or a footpath running through them, so we are paying landowners for something that we already have. Those access payments amount to £6 million over 10 years. The issue should be looked at because we are not receiving value for money from the access element of countryside stewardship.

An example of where more money could be saved is the common agricultural policy. I was disturbed to see that the Budget increases our contribution to the CAP next year by £60 million. Families pay around an additional £20 a week because of CAP contributions, so we should look carefully at that budget head. We should look particularly carefully at the arable areas scheme, which pays grants to farmers for producing certain products, principally cereals. In the last year for which figures are available—1994—English farmers received £1.2 billion. As part of that, they received £189 million for set-aside—effectively doing nothing. Nobody likes set-aside. On pursuing the matter, I found that in 1994 more than 2,000 farmers received payments of more than £75,000 under the arable areas scheme. It is disturbing that such large sums of public money have been paid. We should scrutinise and perhaps cap the amount that individual farmers can receive from the scheme.

I was even more disturbed to find that, in 1994, a small group of farmers received more than £1 million each under the arable areas scheme. I am disturbed that the Government, for reasons of confidentiality, will not say how many farmers received more than £1 million. Nor will they give the top payment made in 1994 under the arable areas scheme. That is big public money, to which poor families in my constituency contribute in terms of higher food costs. They have a right to know who receives that money and how much is received. I invite members of the Treasury Bench to look at the matter.

We should have some return for such payments. We have a right to tell landowners that we want a return for the money that they receive for set aside. We want them to lift the landscape and enhance the environment by creating wildlife habitats, working on hedgerows, planting more trees, creating ponds or putting back the walls that are in disrepair all over the country. If farmers are to receive that kind of money, we have a right to expect a return—a green premium.

I shall now deal with some more familiar themes of the Budget, which other hon. Members have discussed, such as the need to create prosperity and jobs, and reduce unemployment. That is what people in north Nottinghamshire want. They pay for it and they know that they have experienced tax increases. They have had broken promises: there have been 21 tax increases, and a typical family now pays £800 more. Income tax may have gone down by 1p in the pound, but the average family is still £670 worse off under this Budget. People expect and deserve some return.

The Nottinghamshire coalfield has had a tough time and Nottingham miners feel that the Government have betrayed them. I remind the House that, in 1979, 40,000 miners worked in the coal industry in Nottinghamshire whereas today, only some 3,000 work in it. Unemployment is therefore a real problem. In October 1992, the then President of the Board of Trade announced that he would close most of this country's coal industry and unemployment went up in coalfield areas. In small pockets, against the national trend, unemployment is still increasing. In general terms, unemployment is going down.

Since October 1992, unemployment nationally has gone down by 17 per cent. In the Mansfield travel-to-work area, which covers a great deal of the Nottinghamshire coalfield, unemployment has gone down by only 7.1 per cent. That highlights the increasing gap between the affluent and the poor. Certainly that is how it is perceived in the Nottinghamshire coalfield.

I think that people in Nottinghamshire would look askance—in fact, I know it—at the Budget proposal to raise the inheritance tax threshold to £200,000. They know that they could buy a pit house in a place such as Bilsthorpe or Boughton in north Nottinghamshire for £11,000. For those people, £200,000 is beyond the moon. It rings hollow. They are also astonished that the budget for social housing has been cut—and cut severely. The Red Book makes it clear that £500 million has been taken away from housing associations and local authorities this year on top of cuts in the previous two years. For people who live in former National Coal Board houses that now belong to housing associations, there is no prospect of getting a renovation grant through moneys from the Housing Corporation because that was blocked at the time of sale. People live in intolerable circumstances. There is no prospect now of those houses being improved.

To talk about people being allowed to leave £200,000 rings hollow when we consider people who live in a pit house in Bilsthorpe. It rings hollow because the Nottinghamshire coalfield, and coalfield communities across the country, are crying out for investment in education, training, infrastructure and, most of all, in the future.

The Budget cuts investment and capital spending. The people of Nottinghamshire want to see the road to recovery—the road that we want to see is a link between the M1 and the A1 across north Nottinghamshire and, as part of it, the Rainworth bypass.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State for Transport is on the Front Bench. I have noted the cuts that have been made in the trunk road programme. It will not be long before local transport capital expenditure is announced—before Christmas, I believe. We want that road for recovery. We want the Rainworth bypass; it will open up development land in the area and it has the potential to bring new jobs into the area. Nottinghamshire county council has bid for £10 million over the next two years for that. I hope that that bid will be considered not only in terms of traffic and highways but as a bid for a road that can regenerate part of the Nottinghamshire coalfield.

I hope that the Secretary of State for Transport will come again to the Robin Hood line—he was there recently. The county council is in active discussions about the funding shortfall of phase 2 of the line. There is a gap of £4 million. I hope that some compromise can be reached. About £1 million of that £4 million gap results directly from rail privatisation and the increased charges that Railtrack has made.

We want to go forward and extend the line right through the coalfield to Worksop and Retford. Phase 3 is covered in the council's bid and I hope that it will be considered. I hope that the railway transport element of the Department of Transport's budget will be protected, as it has been so far, and that local authorities will get their fair share, especially in the case of the Robin Hood line.

I also want fair shares for English Partnerships, a body set up to help bring regeneration to the coalfields. I note with some alarm that its budget is being cut. We need to clear up derelict sites. There are pit tips and derelict land all over north Nottinghamshire. We need derelict land grant to bring that land back to life. We need to attract factory units, create new businesses and provide homes for new businesses. I am extremely worried that with the cuts in grant aid to English Partnerships all that will be put at risk.

I also note that the training and enterprise councils are to have their budgets cut by 5 per cent., on top of the drop in coalfield money that came to TECs covering the coalfields. Most of all, people in coalfield communities need skilling and reskilling. They need to be competitive in a changing world and investment in training could be a lifeline for them.

I note, too, that the money available to colleges of further education is to be cut. Such colleges are expected to take more students but at a lower cost. I am disturbed about what is happening at some colleges of further education, not only in Nottinghamshire but across the country. The standards of teaching, of courses and of qualifications are dropping. I suggest that some of these CFEs will drop soon. Some are technically bankrupt. It will not be long before the first CFE goes into receivership. That path will be progressed and enhanced by the Budget cuts in their funding.

The windfall tax has received a good deal of criticism. I was surprised on Monday, the day before the Budget when Severn Trent Water, our local private water company, announced increased profits of 75 per cent. or £160 million. I note, too, that all it did for its customers was offer them a £4 cash-back per year. That does not seem to be a great benefit from privatisation. I would have no hesitation in examining the profits and dividends of companies such as Severn Trent and East Midlands Electricity, looking at what they have put back into their capital plans and making a judgment about a windfall tax. Young people are our future. I believe strongly that we ought to offer young people quality routes to training. Money from a windfall tax should be applied in that way.

I note, too, that the civil service is going to be cut by 12 per cent. I was staggered this week to find that European money that could come to Nottinghamshire coalfield communities is being held up because there are not enough civil servants in the Government office for the east midlands to process the application. We paid that money into Europe and we want it back. The stumbling block appears to be a lack of civil servants locally, in the office in Nottingham, to deal with those claims. It is even more astonishing that the local office should have written to local authorities asking for staff to be lent to the Government office to process the claims. Frankly, it is an insult to people in Nottinghamshire.

It is disturbing that no effort has been made in the Budget to get the construction industry going. I remember the private finance initiative being described as additional to Government capital spending. All that now seems to have gone out of the window. I suspect that it will not be long before national lottery money is used in the same way, as a substitute for Government money.

Local authorities have also faced cuts. I have looked carefully at the settlement announced today. Is it not the case that next year local authorities will receive £6.3 billion for capital projects? That is a cut of £700 million—or 10 per cent.—on this year's sum of £7 billion.

I should draw attention to the problem of crumbling schools in Nottinghamshire. Some of the money that has been cut could be used to renovate and refurbish them. There are £85 million-worth of repairs outstanding in Nottinghamshire's schools. In the Chancellor's own constituency of Rushcliffe, there is £6.7 million-worth of work outstanding. I draw attention to Rushcliffe comprehensive school, which has £1.5 million of outstanding repairs, and to Brookside primary school in East Leake, where £105,000-worth of repairs are outstanding.

I know that the governors of those schools, as well as the teachers and parents, would be delighted to see the Chancellor there. They would argue with him about the consequences of the capital cuts to local authorities. I believe that the cuts are shortsighted. We should be investing in capital projects to create jobs and to put down seedcorn for the future.

I deal briefly with the local government finance settlement that was announced today. I am delighted that the Chancellor gave an exclusive interview yesterday to our local paper, the Nottingham Evening Post. He told it that there was a "Cash bonanza for Notts". I think that the Chancellor may play it differently at home from down here in London. Back in Nottinghamshire he has been giving the impression that there is loads of money, boys. The reality, however, is quite different.

If one looks at the financial settlement and focuses especially on education, it is apparent that, this year, local education authorities are spending £797 million more than their standard spending assessment, which is the Government's yardstick. Next year, the pledge of extra money—4.5 per cent. growth in education spending—will bring in £770 million. That promised and lauded extra money does not fill this year's gap.

[Mr. Paddy Tipping]

The people of Nottinghamshire know those figures only too well. They know that the current year's settlement was tight, as the Secretary of State said. In Nottinghamshire's schools, there are 350 fewer teachers now than there were before the summer holidays. That leads to larger class sizes. In north Nottinghamshire, three out of four primary schools have classes of more than 30 pupils, and I believe that there is worse to come. Despite the settlement and the promised cash bonanza from the Chancellor, I do not think that the gap is going to be cut.

In the current year, Nottinghamshire county council is spending £25.5 million, or 7.5 per cent., more on education than the Government yardstick. At best, the settlement announced today brings an extra £15 million into Nottinghamshire schools. That still leaves a budget gap of £10 million.

I anticipate that there will be further cuts in the number of teachers this year, possibly in the region of 300. I find it very hard to understand that, while the number of teachers is being cut and class sizes are getting larger, we, the council tax payers of Nottinghamshire, are being asked to pay more. I think that 300 teachers' posts may go and class sizes will get larger. For that privilege, I anticipate that the increase in our council tax next year will be about double the rate of inflation. We shall pay more and get less in Nottinghamshire.

I do not think that the Chancellor can hurt the people of Nottinghamshire any more. He should listen to the people he meets and respond to those who have written to him. I expect that he has had 25,000 letters about local authority cuts from his constituents. They want better and I want better.

In the future, I want a Budget that is green and clean. I want a Budget that enhances the environment and lifts the landscape. I want a Budget that puts investment for prosperity at its core—investment in education, training and infrastructure and—most important—a Budget that invests in the future of Nottinghamshire children.

8.16 pm

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): I thoroughly enjoyed the speech made by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. Unlike the relatively few contributions of Opposition Members, it was factual. The speech made by the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), who led for the Opposition, did not contain one fact. Of course, she attacked us—I do not complain about that—but it would have been novel to hear just a little about what the Opposition propose to do to make up for what they consider that we have not done.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South also had a rattling good cheek in suggesting that the Government had arranged for so many statements to be made today to reduce the time for debate on the Budget. The irony was that, at that moment, there were hardly any faces to be seen on the Opposition Benches. Had the Government done as she suggested—of course, I do not believe for a minute that they did—then one would have to say, "Thank goodness" because we would have had precious few contributions from Opposition Members.

I was interested to hear what the Liberal Democrat spokesman had to say. He said that, on Budget day, he and his colleagues noticed how glum we—the Conservative Members—were looking. That is odd, because we were looking at them and thinking how glum they were. I think that they realised that there might be a great deal more in the Budget than they were able to take in on the day.

Mr. Spring: Does my hon. Friend recall that the Liberal Democrats looked most glum after the speech made by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown)?

Mr. Cran: My hon. Friend makes a telling intervention.

I support the Budget. As I look back at various Budgets, but without mentioning one in particular, I would have to admit that I found it less easy to say that I supported some of them, but I certainly support this one. Like many of my colleagues, I have been astonished by the publicity surrounding the Budget, which implies that Conservative Members are opposed to it. That is not the case. If I achieve nothing else, I should like to say that I and many of my colleagues support the Budget. Opposition Members may be worried that it is a two-stage exercise. The Chancellor would not say that—he would say that it is merely the latest Budget, and I understand that. However, I expect it to be a two-stage exercise and I am afraid that Opposition Members will have to wait for another Budget in November 1996. The smiles on the faces of Opposition Members may be fewer then than they appear to be now.

My first reason for being enthusiastic about the Budget is that it is fiscally sound. It introduces tax cuts, but there are also cuts in expenditure. I might have wanted rather more in the way of tax cuts than were introduced and I might have wanted a few more cuts in public expenditure, but that is a matter of judgment. Whatever else might be said, there is no doubt that the Budget has impressed the marketplace. That fact was not taken into account by any of the contributions that I have heard from Opposition Members.

I like the fact that there are no gimmicks in the Budget. What is a gimmick? We can all look up the word in the dictionary, but one gimmick that we kept on hearing about from Opposition spokesmen was kick-starting the housing market. I am delighted that the Chancellor did no such thing. There are low interest rates and price discounting in the housing market, which is enough to get the market moving eventually. I invite all Opposition Members to come up to Beverley, where the housing market is beginning to move. I have the impression that that is happening in other parts of the country—therefore, there is no need for gimmicks.

I am also delighted that the Government have resumed the tax-cutting propensity—that is what Conservative Governments are rightly concerned about in the medium and long term. I am delighted at that resumption because I have always believed, and I expect I always will, that the state—even under prudent Conservative Governments—has spent too much of other people's money. That was brought home to me by the social security budget which, I well remember, stood at £37 billion when I was first elected to Parliament in 1987 and next year will be about £94 billion or £95 billion. Conservative Governments have done much to add to that total, which is why I am supportive of the present Government's efforts to examine critically what the state spends and what the individual spends. I would like that debate to be encouraged among not only Conservative Members, but Opposition Members. I do not think, however, that it is taking place among Opposition Members.

I like the Budget for another reason which was never mentioned by Opposition spokesmen—it encourages business, industry and the City. Undoubtedly, the reaction to the Budget from business generally has been better than the right hon. Member for Derby, South was prepared to admit. She merely took the tepid view of the Confederation of British Industry—an organisation that I admire less and less, even though I was once employed by it. One has to look less at what the CBI says and more at what individual business men say, which gives a different picture. Business men have given the Budget a much more enthusiastic response and if I have time I shall tell the House what one or two business men have said.

Finally, I am enthusiastic about the Budget because it encourages savers. I am not only a Scotsman but an Aberdonian and we are famous for our capacity to save money, which I do. I am delighted that the Government are now giving the community another impetus to save because the savings ratio of late has not been nearly good enough, although it is improving. Many within the community will wake up to the fact that there have been reductions in tax for those of us who save money in building societies, banks or wherever. Moreover, I note that even my hon. Friends are forecasting cuts in the interest rate. Of course, the business community wants interest rate cuts, but we must remember that what benefits industry does not benefit the saver. I shall, however, leave the Treasury team to deal with that conundrum.

Direct taxation is thankfully resuming its downward trend. The Labour party—not particularly tonight, but on radio, television and in the newspapers—states that it is now the low-tax party. My constituents in Beverley should treat that statement with extreme caution. My neighbour, the deputy leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), said that such promises as the Labour party would make—we do not have the details—would be for one year only. The electors of Beverley and elsewhere had better remember that.

In addition, Opposition Members in private also tell me, "Well, you will see what happens when the boot is on the other foot." We all know what that means: the Opposition will enjoy the ability to take more money out of people's pockets. I warn the taxpayers of this country to look out. The Labour party would introduce more bands for direct tax because that would take out more money from other people's pockets. The upper rate band would undoubtedly be increased to between 50 and 60 per cent., if not more.

The other issue that I never hear mentioned by Opposition Members, except in private, is that of unearned income. I do not have any unearned income; I have had to earn all my capital—a distinction not made by the Opposition. Under a Labour Government, unearned income will undoubtedly be plundered because they will need the cash.

I am pleased about what the Government have done in relation to inheritance tax. I was delighted last June to hear my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister make a commitment to the Conservative party that inheritance tax should be progressively abolished. It is a monstrous tax. I caution Opposition Members to look at how many people in the community have to pay inheritance tax. In some cases, tax has been paid throughout the lifetime of the capital and the Treasury and the Government take the final cut on one's deathbed. That is simply monstrous and I am delighted to hear what my Government intend to do. I welcome the increase of the exempt amount to £200,000 and I look forward to the abolition of the tax.

I have mentioned reducing tax on savings. Clearly, many people have not cottoned on to the fact that they will retain more of the interest than they receive on their accounts. I applaud that measure.

I was pleased that the Budget contained very few references to VAT which, as we know, is an unpopular tax. It is not as bad when it is levied on luxuries—although I never know what a luxury is these days—but it is a different matter when it is levied on essentials. It is, however, far too easy to raise VAT. It encourages spenders in Government. We must have one or two spenders on the Conservative Benches—although not too many—but there are certainly a great many on the Opposition Benches.

I warn the community again. A tax that is too easy to raise encourages spending in Government Departments. I say to my Conservative colleagues that we must be careful and recognise the public resistance to that tax. I am resistant to VAT. I have always bought new cars until now, but I have no intention of doing so in the future, as I am not prepared to pay the valued added tax on a new car. I may even reach the stage of buying second-hand suits, if I have to, to avoid that tax. However, I am idiosyncratic on that subject and I expect that the House will bear with me.

On long-term care, I am delighted that my Government have recognised what were undoubtedly the beginnings of a minor scandal, which occurred as a result of the developments in community care. I am pleased that the first step has been taken. I do not regard the first step as being especially generous, but it is a move in the right direction. I look forward to quick initiatives that will come out of my Government to ensure that we do not have the position that exists in my constituency—the same can be said of others—where people find it necessary to sell houses to pay for the fees for long-term care that they receive alongside some people who did not save, although some people were simply unfortunate and could not save. I fail to understand why I, and many of my constituents, should forgo consumption to pay for that care whereas others do not.

I finish with one or two comments about what the Budget has done for industry. Having been associated with the Confederation of British Industry, I know that industry is the boiler house of wealth creation. Industry and business create wealth. They create the cake and we divide it. Therefore what we should do, which is better done by a Conservative Government, is ensure that we encourage industry, but not with hand-outs. Too often, the Opposition say that industry needs help in the form of a hand-out. Industry wants no such thing. It wants what the present and the preceding Government have done—which is to provide a deregulated background in which it can operate. Usually, business men ask Governments to keep out of their hair. I believe that Conservative Governments have done that, in the case of inflation, and I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor on the fact that he continues to bear down on that evil.

[Mr. Cran]

I well remember all the industrialists I used to speak to in the period 1975-79, who repeatedly mentioned the fact that the inflation rate was increasing. It reached about 26 per cent.

Mr. Spring: Twenty-seven per cent.

Mr. Cran: I am corrected, and I am happy to be so. What did that do for the competitiveness of British industry and individual companies? It completely destroyed the former, and it destroyed the prospects of many good companies. Therefore, the Chancellor is absolutely correct to bear down on inflation.

The Chancellor was equally correct not to impose a windfall tax. In that regard, I do not understand why the Opposition do not understand why a windfall tax would not be beneficial to the British economy. It would be beneficial to the extent that a Labour Government would use the proceeds in some way for one year, but what signal does that send out to inward investing companies? I venture to suggest that they would be less interested in coming to the United Kingdom than has heretofore been the case, when I believe—I am open to being corrected—that more than half the inward investment of the European Union has come to the United Kingdom. I am also delighted to notice what my Government have done on uniform business rates.

I have referred to the tepid—it is tepid—judgment of the CBI. I can therefore throw that away. However, I read in the Financial Times that the chief executive of Asda Group, Mr. Archie Norman, said:

"We are delighted. It is a bullseye."

That was not mentioned by the right hon. Member for Derby, South, was it? Sir David Simpson, chairman of British Petroleum, said:

"It is good to see that the Government intends to continue reducing its spend as a proportion of GDP and that it has reaffirmed its aim to balance the Budget"— and so on. He is obviously delighted.

Sir John Banham, a former director-general of the CBI, and chairman of Tarmac, says:

"The Chancellor is on the right track and the measures he has put in place provide the best prospects for the UK building industry."

The right hon. Lady should have balanced her remarks by telling us about that.

What does the City say?

"He's taken the prudent path"

says the head of bond research from Yamaichi international bank. I could go on, but I know that other hon. Members wish to speak. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I shall therefore bring my remarks to a close—reluctantly, because I should like to say an awful lot more on that subject. However, I hope that my colleagues will allow me to ask one question. After 16 years of Conservative Governments, one would suppose that the United Kingdom was in tatters. Why, therefore, is it the case that the City of London—I just happened to pick up a document at random the other day—appears to go from strength to strength? It should not be so, if the Opposition's comments are justified.

What do I read?

"London is the world's largest international insurance market"— not the second or third, but the largest—

"with net premium income of £9.9 billion . . . There are over 540 foreign banks in London".

Would they come if the UK was as the Opposition portray it to be? Of course they would not. Moreover,

"The London foreign exchange market is the largest in the world, with a daily turnover of $464 billion—more than the turnover of New York and Tokyo combined."

I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, but they will, I know, allow me to say that London is the world's second largest fund management centre, after Tokyo, with more than $750 billion of institutional equity holdings.

I might go on and on, but I cannot. By public demand—I should say by popular demand of my colleagues—I shall sit down. I simply finish by saying, it is a rattling and a damned good Budget. It has the whole-hearted support of Conservative Members and I fear that the Opposition will live to regret what they said before the Budget. If I remember rightly, they said that it would be a giveaway and would be recognised by the British people as such. It was no such thing; and just wait for the next one.

8.37 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) and I shall discuss some of his arguments later.

I very much enjoyed the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping), who spoke about several issues, and suggested ways in which the green tax might be developed.

In my estimation, the Budget has hit the most vulnerable people the hardest, to achieve a 1p reduction in income tax. It has hit the unemployed, single parents, the under-25s on housing benefit and disabled people on long-term hospital stays—all to achieve a reduction in income tax of only 1p.

The Budget has once again widened social divisions. I wonder where the Prime Minister's stated objective of achieving a classless society has gone. It certainly was not referred to in the Budget.

There is little cheer for little England in the Budget, because the typical family will pay £670 more per year in tax. They certainly will not be cracking open the champagne in Barnsley. My constituency, which comes into Barnsley, has a great deal of unemployment. Calculated on a narrow basis over the travel-to-work area, unemployment in Barnsley is 18.1 per cent. of males. There are pockets in some mining villages where unemployment is much greater. It is as high as 40 per cent. in some mining villages.

The Chancellor talked of an enterprising Budget that would motivate entrepreneurs and the unemployed alike. That theme was echoed by the Secretary of State today, but I do not expect the Budget to make the economy more robust.

One factor overlooked by the Secretary of State when he spoke of the advantages that deregulation was bringing is its potential to act as a drag on the economy. That is particularly true following the abolition of the wages councils. A study carried out recently by the Low Pay Network showed that Barnsley had been severely affected by that: for instance, 79 per cent. of relevant vacancies advertised in the town's jobcentre offered lower rates of pay than could have been advertised before the abolition of the councils.

The position is similar in a number of northern towns. According to a summary of the survey's findings, 69.2 per cent. of jobs advertised in Rotherham's jobcentre could not have been advertised at the same pay rates if wages councils had been in existence. In Walsall the figure was 66.1 per cent., and it was 60.7 per cent. in Halifax and Wigan. It is clear that a minimum wage should be introduced.

Opposition Members have long advocated such a move. If we are to lift people out of poverty, it is essential to give a greater stimulus to those who are looking for work. A minimum wage would also stimulate industry. It would do two things that Conservative Members never mention when they talk about the minimum wage. First, it would lead to innovative action by employers: that would boost the capital goods market, which in turn would require skilled labour. It would have a ripple effect throughout the economy. Secondly, it would free more labour for education and better training. In my view, a skills shortage is a significant barrier to competition. The availability of higher-level skills would, for example, enable manufacturing industry to use more capital-intensive processes. Taken together, those moves would nudge the United Kingdom's economy towards the higher-value end of the market—and that is where the United Kingdom must be if it is to survive in a ferociously competitive world market.

Low pay has proved to be a drag on the economy in the mining industry, for example. In 1913, before the first world war, we reached the zenith of mining production with 1,197,000 miners, but in Britain only about 13 per cent. of coal was cut by machine. In Germany, almost a third of coal was cut by that process. By the end of the war, two thirds of coal in America was cut by machine; in this country, we had hardly advanced since 1913. That was because of the availability of a glut of cheap labour. It took nationalisation after 1945 to bring technology into the mining industry. Cheap labour can hold back innovation.

Training and education—along with investment, of course—are major ingredients of prosperity, but the Government do not take that too seriously. Since 1979, the United Kingdom has slipped from 13th to 18th position in the world prosperity league table. If that statistic shows anything, it shows the Government's abject failure. It shows that we have not been directing enough money into investment, and that in that way we have allowed many of our industries to lag behind those of our competitors.

It is because education and training are so important that the Chancellor should have introduced a windfall tax. I know that the hon. Member for Beverley is opposed to that, but I believe that, since the privatisation of the utilities, local monopolies in electricity and water have made billions of pounds on the backs of their customers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood pointed out, Severn Trent admitted yesterday that its profits were up by 75 per cent. on last year. Even Yorkshire Water, whose pipe network is leaking at least a third of water supplies every day, announced that its profits were up by 50 per cent. The Secretary of State said that investment in the water industry was increasing, but over a five-year period it has fallen by £282 million. That is an enormous loss of investment as a result of privatisation.

The Chancellor should have seized the opportunity to use the excessive profits of the utilities to invest in education and training. That would have given young people a chance to acquire the skills that would help them to secure jobs. Is there any better way in which to use those excess profits than to invest them in the nation's future?

No doubt the Chancellor will have had his eye on the proceeds that are likely to result from the sale of the nuclear generating industry next summer. That, too, is a privatisation too far. It is estimated that the price will be about £2.6 billion, which is less than the cost of building the Sizewell pressurised water reactor. The Chancellor talked of competitiveness and competition, but the sale of the nuclear industry will further neither objective. Energy prices are one of the elements that increase competitiveness, but since the privatisation of the electricity industry—contrary to what the Secretary of State told us—the cost to large users has not fallen. In fact, the cost to large users in the United Kingdom is much higher than that in most of our European competitors. It is far in excess of the cost in France, for example.

The creation of the two new nuclear companies will not help competitiveness. Magco will take on the Magnox stations, and will go over to British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., and British Energy will own the five advanced gas-cooled reactors and the pressurised water reactor. Between them, they will supply between 25 per cent. and 29 per cent. of the United Kingdom's electricity needs. As all that is base-load electricity, there is bound to be a stream of revenue following privatisation. After the privatisation of the nuclear generating industry, it is more likely to diversify into gas. Once the gas stations are on stream they will not compete with nuclear capacity, whose base-load electricity is bid into the pool at zero. So the new gas capacity will compete with other gas stations or with coal. It is therefore likely that the coal stations will be pushed off the grid.

Privatising the nuclear industry is folly. It will not help to diversify our fuel mix, and it will not improve our competitiveness. Indeed, prices in the energy market may rise thereafter.

It is accepted even by Conservatives that we invest much less than do our competitors. Japan invests twice as much as we do; America invests £863 per person more; and Switzerland a massive £2,766 more. Conservative Members like to talk about 1979. In 1979, Portugal invested £177 per head less than did the United Kingdom. Now it invests £312 more than we do.

Furthermore, the Budget, besides not increasing investment as required, did not sufficiently encourage investment in the areas that need it. The Government had the opportunity to create an arms diversification agency to harness expertise and capital from the armaments industry as it adapts to civil production. But Conservative Members seem to find that idea anathema.

What is more, this country needs more research and development. We have cut back dramatically our investment in clean coal technology, an area in which we once led the world. The danger is that the same could happen to the nuclear industry after privatisation.

[Mr. Michael Clapham]

Research and development are the seedcorn for the future, and the Chancellor should have provided much more encouragement for them—but chose not to.

Research and development need to be focused on civil, not military production. That would allow spin-offs from civil R and D to the military, instead of the other way round. Germany and Japan have shown what can be achieved when research and development are focused on civil production, with spin-offs for military production.

Overall, the Budget did nothing for unemployment. The Government have put taxes up by 7p and lowered them by 1p, still leaving the typical family paying £670 more in tax. The Chancellor has failed to come up with a Budget for investment, to increase prosperity and to ensure the UK's competitiveness in world markets.

8.53 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me the chance to say a few words.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) that a Budget that is cheered to the rafters often looks less appetising six months on. The headline in The Sun confirmed for me that this Budget will be the opposite sort, in which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has introduced some sensible tax cuts, targeting key spending areas and producing a number of important innovations.

Bryan Gould, who has now left us for New Zealand, used to talk about the Labour party's lack of any sort of macro-economic policy in the key areas of interest rates, exchange rates, taxation and monetary policy. He said that Labour had no such policies. It was thoroughly disappointing again this evening to hear the speech of the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), which contained no policies, ideas or opinions: just criticisms. Her performance served to show the vacuum in Labour party policy.

My right hon. and learned Friend sought to deal with many challenges in his Budget. I should like to examine two of them, the first of which is not essentially a party political issue. Ours is an aging population. An ever smaller percentage of the population works to support an ever larger element in retirement. There is no escaping that fact. The implications for fiscal policy and for public borrowing are critical. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security is paring back the increases in the billowing social security budget from 3 per cent. to 1 per cent. a year.

It has become something of a cliché to talk about global markets and communications, but the fact is that Governments' ability to control events outside their borders, if markets do not like the policies that they are pursuing, is strictly limited. We live in a time of open markets and of ferocious attacks on currencies. As an older, mature economy, it is our duty to ensure that we run a low-inflation, low-tax economy if we are to compete with the emerging economies in the far east and elsewhere. We have no option in the matter if we are to face up to the changing demographic balance in this country and in other industrialised nations.

In this respect I welcome the announcements affecting the problem of long-term health care for the elderly. Many elderly people have been very worried about the thresholds, which have now been raised from £3,000 to £10,000 and from £8,000 to £16,000. That represents a serious move on the part of the Government, who, like Governments in all industrialised countries, have had to face up to the problem and to lay the foundations for long-term care provision. That involves creating the right sort of fiscal programme.

The Government and the Chancellor have sought successfully to encourage savings, with the introduction of PEPs and TESSAs and the extraordinary increase in the number of personal pension arrangements that help people sensibly to plan for major demographic change—in this country and across the industrialised world. In that respect this Budget marks a watershed.

Investment is crucial to our survival in this competitive world. There has been a huge improvement in manufacturing productivity and in inward investment to the UK from outside Europe. That has enabled us to compete well by attracting scarce capital. It is creating jobs, new technologies and industries that are extremely beneficial.

Since the end of the second world war, every time there has been economic recovery, we have had a sterling or balance of payments crisis. So many of the nationalised industries that were damp hands on the economy in the 1970s are now leading our export effort and showing the rest of British industry the way forward by creating employment, producing taxes and helping to ensure that our export performance is excellent by the standards of the past 30 or 40 years. It is interesting to see the transformation that has taken place in that respect.

To achieve our aim of being the enterprise centre of Europe, we have to continue to cut tax as a percentage of GDP. I am pleased that Government expenditure as a percentage of GDP is projected to fall to 40 per cent. in 1997-98 and to 38 per cent. two years later. Let us aim for 35 per cent.—the levels that apply in Japan and the United States. If we continue to reduce that percentage, we shall bequeath a vibrant and dynamic environment in which business will prosper.

I very much welcome the private finance initiative, which will address the enormous pressures on the social and transport infrastructure of Britain and all other mature industrialised countries.

I welcome the further expansion of the 20p tax band, which means that 200,000 lower-paid people will be taken out of taxation altogether and one quarter of all taxpayers will now pay only 20p. I applaud the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend set a clear marker to a 20p tax rate. There are no gimmicks; we are on our way to achieve that.

Those policies have produced quite exceptional results in Britain. Unlike the other industrialised countries in Europe where unemployment is growing, in Britain it has fallen by 700,000 in the past three years. In my own constituency, the unemployment rate is now 4.3 per cent, having dropped by 8.4 per cent. in one year and 35 per cent. in three years. That success is reflected in the lives and aspirations of my constituents and I look with pleasure at the effect of Government policy in the part of west Suffolk that I represent.

I should tell my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that I personally welcome the vehicle tax exemption on 25-year-old cars. I have a 1973 Rover 3.5 litre coupé. The car looks forward to being two or three years older and escaping that taxation.

I thank my right hon. and learned Friend and the other Treasury Ministers for addressing the problem of general betting duty. I have the great pleasure of representing the world's headquarters of racing in Newmarket. The national lottery has had a serious impact on prize money in the racing industry. The cut of 1 per cent. in general betting duty will stimulate the employment gains that are already developing in the industry as a result of the VAT registration concessions given in the Budget three years ago. On behalf of my constituents, as the racing industry is the largest employer in my constituency, I thank the Treasury team for that important concession which will be highly valued in even further reducing the already low rate of unemployment in Bury St. Edmunds.

Finally, my right hon. and learned Friend has produced a coherent, sensible and restrained Budget. In 12 months' time it will be possible further to extend tax cuts to produce a lower rate of inflation in a growing economy. The Budget is a watershed as we have turned the corner from a recessionary era into a period of sustained growth and low inflation. I welcome it and congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on presenting it so well.

9.3 pm

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): It is a pleasure to be able to take up the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring), who serves with me as a member of the Select Committee on Health. I echo his comments about the growth of the elderly population and the proposals in the Budget, which I welcome, that are designed as a first stage to deal with the difficult problem of providing long-term care for the elderly.

I warmly welcome the Budget as a whole. I think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer got it right. Some difficult decisions had to be taken, especially given the state of public finances.

The key to economic success is the achievement of sustainable growth. There is no doubt that in 1994-95 and beyond we have and will achieve that growth. One of the judgments of the Budget is whether we shall continue to achieve sustainable growth. I believe that we shall do so, and I think that most economists would share that judgment.

What do businesses ask of the Government in managing the economy? The answer is that they want stability. They do not want the old days of stop-go, when they boosted their production only to find that it had to come to a halt as the economy went into recession as a result of overheating. Businesses want stability. They want stable inflation, stable growth and stable interest rates so that they can plan sensibly. The Budget is prudent in its judgment on public finances because tax cuts are balanced by reductions in public spending. Surely that is the way in which to proceed.

It is important that tax cuts put money back into the pockets of the public. The cuts will have a significant impact on consumer expenditure. Despite the comments of Opposition Members, the public know better than the Government how to spend their money.

There is a danger that Budgets can be over-hyped. We heard so much nonsense before the Budget about the level of tax cuts that would be achieved. As I have said, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor got it right with cuts of £3.25 billion, which were balanced by cuts in public spending. More important, does the Budget pave the way for reductions in interest rates, which would be much appreciated by businesses and mortgagees throughout the country? I believe that it does, and I urge my right hon. and learned Friend, in his meetings with Eddie George, to adhere to the tough line that he has adopted and go for interest rate cuts.

It is my view that the Governor of the Bank of England has been wrong about interest rates over the past year. The issue is crucial to understanding why my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor had limited room for manoeuvre this year. I spoke in the Budget debate last year, when none of us knew what growth rate would be achieved in 1994. We now know that we achieved a growth rate of 3.9 per cent. There was concern about whether the economy would overheat and whether inflation would get out of control. We have seen some increases in interest rates. If my right hon. and learned Friend had followed the Governor's lead, we would have higher interest rates.

What have we seen? In the Red Book, growth for 1995 was predicted to be 3.25 per cent. That was only a forecast. In the summer forecast it was scaled down to 3 per cent. It is now forecast to be 2.75 per cent. We know that in the third quarter it was down to 2.1 per cent. In other words, interest rate cuts have had an effect, along with the slow-down in the world economy, on the growth rate of our economy.

What has been the effect of that slow-down? Tax revenue has been reduced significantly. I understand the exact reasons for the reduction in tax revenues. It is a problem that affects other countries. We know for certain, however, that a slow-down in growth will have an impact on tax revenues. We know also that £7.5 billion is an enormous sum. The Government have had to face difficulties with the public sector borrowing requirement, but we have been extremely successful in keeping spending under control. That is a key achievement.

What better position would we have been in if tax revenues had held up? My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor might have been able to introduce further tax cuts. My message and plea to the Treasury Bench is that we should not be too cautious over the next 12 months. Let us see growth in the real economy. There is little sign of inflation taking off. Wage increases, for about the first time in our history, are below the rate of inflation. That is extremely good news.

At the same time, the slow-down in wage increases has had an effect on growth. In other words, there are some difficult balances. We must ensure that we achieve at least the levels of growth that are predicted in the Red Book. I would hate to have to say next year that we achieved not 3 per cent. but 2.5 per cent. I do not accept the argument that the underlying trend rate of the economy, which some say is 2.75 per cent., while others claim that it is 2.5 per cent., is fixed in stone for ever and a day. It depends on the improvements in productivity that industry is achieving, and there is no doubt that in recent years industry has become much more productive and successful. That should be borne in mind.

[Mr. David Congdon]

The debate has been fascinating. We hear a lot about new Labour and how the party has changed its ways, but listening tonight, particularly to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), I thought that I must be in a time warp. The hon. Gentleman had some quaint ideas about a minimum wage encouraging investment in capital equipment. It might well do. That is not quaint. But it would have a disastrous effect on unemployment.

We also had a revelation that I have heard on previous occasions, again from the hon. Gentleman but also from other hon. Members, about Government directing investment. What a disaster it would be for Britain if the Government were to decide where investment should go. Government would never get it right when it came to deciding in which industries to invest. The only people who can judge where to invest are those in the businesses themselves.

We hear a lot about underinvestment. Investment is up, but the Opposition concentrate on public sector investment, as if that constituted the greater part of investment. I looked in the Red Book earlier to see whether my understanding of investment was correct. In broad terms, investment in Britain is running at about £100 billion a year. Of that, only about 20 per cent. is public investment. The vast bulk of investment is decided by businesses and industries throughout the land. They invest only when there is a stable macro-economic framework and they can see a demand for their product. That is why the Government are so right to have the sound economic policies that they have.

Listening to Opposition Members on public expenditure, I sometimes wonder whether they are being honest with the electorate. Earlier this afternoon we were told that we had squandered our oil revenues and privatisation receipts. But what have they been "squandered" on? They have been spent on essential public services. Since 1979, an extra 70 per cent. has been spent on the health service. Spending on education is up 50 per cent. per pupil. There has been a £70 billion increase in real terms in public expenditure since 1979. I do not recall hearing Labour Members say that we should not put more money into health or education. Therefore, it is dishonest of them to try to pretend that that money has been squandered.

To return to the specifics on public spending in the Budget, I applaud strongly the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend has found room for extra spending on essential services. I am particularly pleased to see the £1.3 billion extra—1.6 per cent.—for health, as well as the £878 million for education. Surely those are the right sort of priorities to have. We should cut out waste and inefficiency and spend money on essential services.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has the Budget strategy right. It is a prudent Budget. I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to keep an eye on the ball of interest rates in order to ensure that we have the growth that the economy needs in the coming year. We must aim to ensure that we achieve at least the 3 per cent. set out in the Budget statement so that we are on target for the sustainable growth that the country wants and demands.

9.12 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): When my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor sat down on Tuesday, we all heard a somewhat strangled cry of, "Is that all?" It came in jeering tones from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and in anguished tones from the Press Gallery. The gentlemen of the press had already written their headlines and articles. Those headlines read, "Panic-stricken Tories wreck Government finances and shatter recovery". They went on to long articles about scorched earth and things of that sort, assuming that the Conservatives would throw in the sponge and give up on the Government.

That just proves that the gentlemen of the press do not understand the Conservative party. Not only do we intend to win, but we want to carry out our patriotic duty and, in so doing, we will regain the support of the public because they will respond with the respect that has led us to victory after victory at the polls.

The appropriate headline for the Budget is, "Boring but responsible". It is clearly tackling the deficit. It is continuing the tight control on inflation. It is tightening up the control on borrowing. Indeed, it is creating the conditions for the interest rate reductions that we want to see. I am frustrated that we have not yet seen them, and that, of course, is because we handed over the decision to the Governor of the Bank of England. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor to give Eddie George his marching orders and get those interest rates down, because they will accelerate growth and will cut unemployment. Indeed, in my constituency, unemployment is already down to the level of April 1991 and is continuing to drop steadily.

A drop in interest rates would also bring about a recovery in the property market. It would be good for business and for home owners, but not quite so for savers, and that was one of the more significant aspects of the Budget. It did not escape our notice that my right hon. and learned Friend created a 20 per cent. tax band on savings, which would offset the effect on savers of the reduction in interest rates that the economy, home owners and the public wish to see.

The Budget is good for education, good for health and good for the police. This afternoon, we heard that there was an extra 4 per cent. for schools in my constituency. But those very services sowed the seeds of our current conditions, because we have just been through the worst recession since the 1930s, and any financially responsible Government would have responded to a drop in revenue by cutting their expenditure. Yet the Conservative Government continued to increase expenditure on health to the extent that today it is up 70 per cent. in real terms on the figure left behind by the previous Labour Government. We continued the increase in spending on education, which is now up by 50 per cent. We protected the pensioners.

Contrast that with the Labour Government who preceded us. Let us remember the Labour Government in the recession of 1976, when they slashed the hospital building programme. They cut the pay of nurses. They cut the pensioners' Christmas bonus. But even that did not work and they carried the begging bowl of this proud country to the International Monetary Fund to queue up behind the sub-Saharan countries for a loan. We did not have to do that. Why? Because the Conservative Government have a reputation for sound finance. The trouble is that one does not keep that reputation if one continues to borrow heavily. That is precisely why, during the past three very difficult years, we had to borrow and, above all, taxes had to be increased.

Mr. Harvey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Arnold: No I will not, because I am short of time and the hon. Gentleman has just walked in.

I shall press on by saying that we have now got through the difficult period. We are now in the great period of getting off the backs of the taxpayers. It is interesting to note where we have done that. We have got off the backs of the less well-off. We have the 1 per cent. cut in the basic rate. The personal allowance is up by £240 and we have the extension of the 20 per cent. band, all of which will help the less well-off into jobs and help them and their families to greater prosperity.

I would argue that that it is not enough. But where are we to make the cuts? We have seen thoughtful proposals from my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), with his proposals for £5 billion of cuts, which should be handed back to the public.

The Budget is intellectually honest, but what is not, however, is the approach of the Labour party, particularly the speech of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) the shadow Chancellor. He was jeering over tax. Would he cut tax more? If so, what would he cut to finance it? He would not answer. His comments about the poor taxpayer of Britain are just like the devil worried about sin. What a nerve. In the debate on Wednesday, he was asked question after question. He did not answer. I asked him how he would finance the cost of his 10 per cent. rate. No answer. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) asked him what would be the impact of the social chapter and a statutory minimum wage. No answer. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) then went on to ask him about the 20 per cent. band extension at a cost of £800 million and asked whether the hon. Gentleman would support it. He did not answer then, any more than we will get an answer yes or no from the official Opposition to the Budget.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) then asked the shadow Chancellor what target he had for inflation, referring to the 27 per cent. inflation that the last Labour Government achieved. Again, no answer. This is the person who would run our economy in 18 months' time, if one believed him and some of the pundits.

One of the most interesting parts of the Budget was the private finance initiative. It is thoroughly new and a great departure. Let us remember that this reforming Government progressively introduced local financial management to schools, which progressed to grant-maintained schools, which are very effective in delivering the goods. In the national health service, the Government introduced fundholding practices and NHS trusts, which again are delivering the goods. I find it a matter for great optimism that we Conservatives are still coming up with the new projects.

On the private finance initiative, I will cite the example of the NHS in my constituency. We have been waiting year after year for our brand new general hospital at Darenth park at a cost of £100 million. We have not got it. Why? Because the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot sign a cheque for £100 million. The Treasury keeps saying, "How about sticking the hospital on a ropey old site?" We combine the ropey old facilities with the phased development of our hospital. Now that the project has been put out to the PFI, what does the private sector opt to do? It says, "We would build it all in one go, on the better site at Darenth park and we can do it on the following financial conditions." The PFI is a major departure and will get the massive new capital projects that we need in the NHS and elsewhere.

I strongly support the Budget. It is a step on the road. At the next Budget, when we have much more scope for tax cuts, let us make it a Budget for the family.

9.20 pm

Mr. Mike O'Brien (North Warwickshire): This has been a good debate—there have been some interesting contributions from both sides of the House—and I welcome the opportunity in this, my first speech from the Opposition Front Bench, to welcome it.

I should declare an interest. I have been the parliamentary adviser to the Police Federation for the past two years. I shall cease to have that role at the end of the month, but it is right that hon. Members should be aware of it.

Perhaps I might begin on a positive note. I have always taken the view that it is not in the interests of an Opposition to criticise and oppose. We should also support and encourage a Government, where that is possible. Mere party political posturing does nothing to enhance the public's view of politicians. I want to make it clear that the Labour party welcomes aspects of this Budget.

The raising of the benefit threshold for pensioners in long-term care is a positive move. The previous levels were low and the increases from £3,000 to £8,000 and £8,000 to £16,000 respectively will spare some pensioners a bill for long-term care, especially since the Government had frozen the thresholds since 1988, thereby making the problem worse.

Nevertheless, £16,000 will not prevent the sale of the matrimonial home. Long-term care is a serious issue with enormous implications, as the hon. Members for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) and for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) said. It is difficult for any Chancellor easily to resolve that issue, but the Government have taken a step forward. I suspect that there will be many further debates on the issue before we get it entirely right.

The Labour party also welcomes the proposals to help and clarify the position on share ownership. We too believe that employees should be encouraged to take a share in their firm. We shall consider with care the proposals that the Chancellor details in the Finance Bill and, if we can, we shall be supportive.

The call for a simpler and more coherent tax regime is also welcome. Indeed, it is something for which Labour has called for a long time. I seem to remember that, in the Standing Committee debate on the Finance Bill last year, our votes, with those of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), pushed through a resolution. Although we must ensure that the detail of the legislation is simplified, we must also ensure that we do not create new loopholes. Nevertheless, the wording of tax law tends to be incoherent to the ordinary person at times and it is good to see a real attempt being made to come to grips with the issue.

I was amused by the confession of the right hon. Member for Northavon (Sir J. Cope) that he contributed so much towards the great detail of our tax laws, although I am not sure how advisable it was to confess it to the many small business men in his constituency who no doubt have had great trouble working out their tax bill. I bet that he will get the accountants' vote.

My Scottish colleagues have campaigned long and hard to bring the duty on whisky down, and the 4 per cent. cut in whisky duty will be helpful. The issues of cross-border sales—bootlegging—are complex, as the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee agreed in its recent report. What the Chancellor has done is not a solution to the problem but merely an interim measure and the Treasury must now explore all the options. I hope that the Minister will be able to set out how the Government seek to achieve some of the aims and conclusions identified in the Select Committee's report.

The right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), as befitted a former and much respected Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, gave a balanced speech. He supported the Budget but conceded that it had not been well received, especially in the press, and hoped that it would be better appreciated in the months to come. He may live in hope—but it will be in vain, I suspect. The right hon. Gentleman was right to draw attention to the slowing of the economy and to say that unemployment had not fallen as much as the Government had hoped. I shall return to the subject of unemployment later.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) made a valuable contribution. He expressed his concerns about some spending and questioned several spending programmes, especially the countryside stewardship programme and the arable areas scheme for set-aside. He raised the disturbing issue of the Government's refusal to answer questions about the number of farmers who receive more than £1 million, and about what was the highest sum received. I hope that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury will be able to reassure my hon. Friend on those subjects. If she cannot do so today, perhaps after she has had the opportunity to read his speech she will make inquiries about the matters that he raised and deal with them in correspondence.

My hon. Friend also made a strong plea for help in his constituency to deal with transport issues. I was pleased to see that a Minister from the Department of Transport took the trouble to listen to him, so I hope that the Secretary of State for Transport will do something about those problems.

It was interesting that the hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) described the Confederation of British Industry's response to the Budget as tepid and somewhat dismissive. That is not what the President of the Board of Trade said earlier. I wonder whether the Government are divided not only on Europe, but on the size of the tax cut and on their attitude to the CBI.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), in a strong speech, described the low wages that were on offer in his constituency as a result of the abolition of the wages councils. He said that the Government had promised much in the way of extra jobs, but that the jobs had not come.

The hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) raised a number of issues. He called the Budget a missed opportunity, said that unemployment in the construction industry was especially high, and called for something to be done about that. He also pointed out that the increases in council tax would probably be three times the rate of inflation.

The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) made a learned contribution, and as he is an accountant he used his considerable knowledge of balance sheets. He warned that the Government had champagne tastes but a beer income and called for more stringent cuts than those delivered in the Budget. In defence of the Chancellor, let me say that I fear that the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West sounded like the quiet cold voice of the man from a warm office who makes decisions about people's lives without balancing logic and calculation with the need for humanity.

I shall now consider the Budget as a whole. It was a give with one hand and take with the other, something and nothing, a 7p up, 1p down Budget, and it left the typical British family £670 worse off than when the Tories were returned to office in 1992. It followed news that Britain had fallen from 13th to 18th place in the league of international prosperity since 1979. After the Budget, Britain is 18th and still falling.

The Budget did nothing to tackle unemployment, to deal with job insecurity, or to heal the wounds of a divided society. It did nothing to tackle the fundamental problems of the British economy, such as the failure over 16 years to encourage long-term investment. It did nothing to provide incentives for the people in the one in five non-pensioner households with no wage earner to move from welfare to work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood also made a strong plea for Britain's young people, one in six of whom are out of work. They are Thatcher's children, and too many of them have been left disillusioned, impoverished and without prospects. What are we here for if not for them? Our young people want jobs, hope and opportunity. They want to make a contribution, but the Chancellor's message to them is that he is restricting the amount of housing benefit for single young people. His hope is poverty, his opportunity is the dole queue and his reward will be the further conviction that the Government do not care for younger people and, perhaps, their future alienation from the political process.

The Chancellor complained that housing benefit should not induce young people to leave their families before they need to. Did it not occur to him that what young people want is jobs, skills and training? If he enabled them to have those things, they would be able to support themselves sooner and would not need to look to their parents or the state to provide financial support.

It is because our young people are important to the nation that Labour made its key spending pledge a new deal for Britain's under-25s. We are not prepared to see a generation of young people abandoned. Already in our inner cities—in Glasgow, Merseyside and inner London—one in three young people are without a job. In London, six out of 10 young black men are jobless. Some 280,000 young people have been unemployed for more than six months while 200,000 young people have never had a job.

Labour proposes to give young people jobs, not schemes. We offer each young person a number of options: an employment option, with a job and a real wage; a voluntary sector option; an option to contribute to our environmental task force; and a full-time education option if the young person lacks basic educational qualifications. To pay for that programme, Labour would impose a windfall tax on the excess profits of the monopoly utilities.

We have seen the size of the profits that those companies are declaring. On Tuesday, Severn Trent admitted that its profits were up by 75 per cent. last year. Yesterday, Yorkshire Water—the company responsible for a third of the country's unplanned and unwarned interruptions in water supplies in the past two years—announced that its profits were up by 50 per cent.

Contrary to what the President of the Board of Trade said at the start of the debate, soaring profits have not encouraged the increased investment needed by those privatised utilities. In the five years since privatisation, capital investment in the water industry has fallen by a total of £282 million. In the same period, profits in the water industry have risen by some £755 million. When it was privatised, the water industry received a £6.5 billion hand-out from the taxpayer in debt write-offs and green dowries. While profits have risen, investment has fallen and, on average, the bills of customers have gone up by 40 per cent. in real terms since privatisation.

Higher water bills are just one example of how families are worse off under the Tories—higher bills, higher charges, higher taxes. That is why a windfall tax would make a contribution to putting Britain's young people back to work. Such a policy would help to reduce benefit bills in the long term and restore hope to our young people.

This Budget was never about Britain or its people, young or otherwise. It was about the Tory party and its divisions. The Chancellor is a one-nation Tory presiding over the fag end of a Government who used to believe in Thatcherite economic policies. As my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) said in a good and balanced speech, the Chancellor knows that the public services are overstretched. I do not doubt that he would like to do something about that, but he knows that he must deliver cuts in the basic rate for the right wing of the Tory party, which worries that the Thatcher legacy is going down the tubes.

Trying to balance the two, the right hon. and learned Gentleman ended up with a package with no overall strategic direction on the economy and no sense of vision for society. It was an attempt to shore up the dissipating Tory vote by scattering alternatively small token tax cuts and shifts in thresholds. Conservative Back Benchers hoped that the Chancellor would buy them votes with tax cuts, but even they know that the vote of the British people is not for sale any more.

I must confess that I have a sneaking regard for the Chancellor. I recall attending this place as a student in the early 1970s and watching the right hon. and learned Gentleman cross swords in an education debate with—if I remember rightly—Shirley Williams, and he appeared very able then. When I was elected to this place, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was Home Secretary. I was put on the Home Affairs Select Committee and I had an opportunity to see him in action. When he became Chancellor, it so happened that I was moved to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. I always thought that the Chancellor was an able performer, and I told my colleagues in the shadow Treasury team that he would come up with something creative, new, innovative or bold, but he disappointed me—almost as much as he disappointed many Tory Back Benchers.

The story of the Budget was told on the glum faces of Tory Back Benchers who filed out at the end of the Chancellor's speech. They had been led to expect flair and imagination; instead, they got a weary, dead-end, dead-beat, dead-loss Budget.

The hon. Member for Beverley sits there with a grin on his face. He denies that Tory faces were so glum at the end of the Budget statement. I recall their looking glum, but I bet those who did not realise that they had every reason to be glum did so when they read the Daily Mail and The Sun the next day.

The economic recovery is so precarious that the Chancellor had little room for manoeuvre. He ended up with a combination of 1p off income tax while putting £9.5 billion on borrowing next year. What price this Chancellor as a sound money man now? The public sector borrowing requirement forecast for 1995-96 has been revised upwards from £23.5 billion in the Treasury summer forecast and from £21.5 billion in the last Budget. It is now £6.5 billion higher than expected in 1995-96, at £25 billion. It will be £9.5 billion higher than expected in 1996-97 and £10 billion higher than expected in 1997-98. That is because the economy is in a mess. Throughout the past 16 years, the Conservatives have neglected investment, squandered the proceeds of North sea oil and, in a display of boom-and-bust economics, put us into the two worst recessions since the war. That in turn has damaged industry's ability to respond to recovery.

The Budget forecast for investment growth in 1995 is now just 1 per cent. The recovery, such as we had, is now precarious and in danger. It was based on an export-led drive, fuelled by a 20 per cent. devaluation of the pound following our ignominious withdrawal from the exchange rate mechanism. But there is a limit to how long we can run the economy on devaluing our currency. This Budget has not dealt with some of the long-term problems of the British economy. It has simply put off resolving them until after the next election, when Labour will be there to deal with them.

It is the ordinary families of Britain whom the Government have really let down: the workers on the assembly line or in the office. For them, right-wing economics have too often meant little or no wage increases in the name of competitiveness, job insecurity to make labour flexible, and the fraying of the safety net. Middle and lower-income people spend more hours working and less time with their children, and they bring home an income that is inadequate to meet housing and other costs. In 1992, many of them voted Tory on promises of lower taxes and opportunities to get on in life. They now feel that the Government have failed them and betrayed their values. For them, Tory promises of opportunity have often meant increased opportunity to lose their jobs.

[Mr. Mike O'Brien]

The failure to reduce unemployment since 1979 has left people paying for big welfare bills of £20 billion, the equivalent of £20 a week for each family. People have seen tax breaks for the very wealthy go unchecked. Their experience of the services that they use, such as schools and hospitals, is of increased commercialisation and financial restraint. They see the immorality of a Government who stand by while a tiny elite prosper and our economic base erodes. They question the fairness of sacrifices made by middle-income families, who must pay higher taxes while, at a time of high dividends, some corporations have paid little tax by taking advantage of tax loopholes that the Government have failed to plug.

The damage done to British families determines Labour's stand on the reduction by 1p of the basic rate of income tax. We cannot vote for it because it does not tackle the fundamental problems of the British economy: lack of investment and lack of jobs. It does nothing to create an incentive to move from welfare to work for the one in five non-pensioner households that have no wage earner. We shall not vote against it because the Tories have damaged British taxpayers enough. They have imposed the biggest tax hike this century—in the year after the 1992 election—beating even Geoffrey Howe's 1981 Budget when personal allowances were not indexed.

Even now, the overall tax burden will be 36.5 per cent. next year, up from 34.75 per cent. in 1992. That is more than when Labour left office. It is forecast to rise each year until the end of the century, reaching 37.5 per cent. by 2000. That is the Tory burden of failure paid by the British people. Labour will not vote to make it worse. Poorly aimed as it is in economic terms, the 1p off the 7p at least gives small relief from the Tory tax rises and broken promises of the past few years.

The Chancellor hoped that his Budget would give the Government the chance to start to build up momentum for the general election. In that judgment he was unsound. He has no clear view of where he is going. He has not addressed the fundamental problems of the economy and he presented no solution to them. The Government are still playing at the game of trying to extend the policies of the 1980s, the me decade, into the latter half of the 1990s. No matter that a crude free market policy and trickle-down economics, which were supposed to lift all the boats, have instead lifted only the yachts and damaged the harbour.

Labour rejects all such economics. We want to move from the me decade policies and make the 1990s the we decade, where the whole country moves forward together. Unless the many prosper, none will really benefit. It is for that reason that the electorate will not be conned by the Tory promises in the Budget or at the next general election. The Government have got it wrong too many times. They have got it wrong this time, too and the electorate know it. That is why, when the time comes to make a decision, they will reject the Government.

9.40 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Angela Knight): First, I congratulate all those hon. Members who are still here late on Thursday night when Parliament is not sitting tomorrow. We certainly had some interesting contributions in the debate, some considerably more factual than others. I thank my hon. Friends for their factual contributions.

The Government's overall economic objective is to promote sustained economic growth and higher living standards. This Budget concentrates on securing Britain's healthy, lasting recovery. It reduces unemployment, continues to reduce borrowing, lets people keep more of the money that they earn and spends money on the things that are important to them. It looks particularly to the education of the young, the job prospects of the working population and security and safety in old age. It continues to offer the best prospect that British people have faced for decades, which is to enjoy the benefits of growth. It is a Budget of substance.

My right hon. Friends the Members for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) and for Northavon (Sir J. Cope) and my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) expressed concern about some of the headlines in the newspapers the day after the Budget. They should not worry about that. Headline writers will always have a field day. They have had one with this Budget, but a headline in the newspaper is like a soundbite from the Leader of the Opposition; it lasts 10 seconds, but for content we have to look elsewhere.

The debate was opened by the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), with what I felt was a snippy little speech. She went through her normal arguments against privatisation. She argued against the £90 electricity rebate that customers will get. She forgot to tell people that when those industries were nationalised, they cost the taxpayers £50 million a week; now, they contribute £55 million a week into the public purse. She forgot to say that when British Steel was nationalised, it was one of the biggest loss makers of all time; now, in private hands, it is profitable and a world leader. She even gave us a harangue against North sea oil. She did not mention the fact that Rolls-Royce in Derby has won a contract for over £1 billion for engines.

The speech of the right hon. Member for Derby, South, I submit, in no way represented the views of industry. Let us look at some of the views of industry. Mr. Archie Norman of Asda said:

"We are delighted. It is a bullseye."

One of the major construction companies said:

"The Chancellor is on the right track and the measures he has put in place provide the best prospects for the UK building industry."

An assistant in a clothing and footwear shop said:

"The Chancellor has listened to the small people . . . it's brilliant news."

The chairman of ICI said:

"I welcome the direction of the Chancellor's policy in reducing public spending and cutting taxes in a fiscally responsible way."

That is what industry said of this Budget. It has given the Budget a very big thumbs-up.

We heard criticism in the Chamber tonight of the private finance initiative. However, Labour seems to have little knowledge of the PFI and does not know what to think about it. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) said:

"Labour believes that the initiative has to be given fresh impetus", but the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) said that the PFI is "a raft for a sort of ramp for privatising".

The Leader of the Opposition says:

"We would get public and private finance working together in transport, in housing, in health and education", but the right hon. Member for Derby, South says:

"Market testing represents creeping privatisation. As does the Private Finance Initiative."

Labour is one party with two faces and two voices, and it is facing in different directions at the same time. Before Labour Members say one word more about the private finance initiative, I suggest that they go and look it up, find out what it is and see the projects that have been signed up.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) made a thoughtful speech. One of his concerns was that council taxes would go up. There was something extraordinary about his argument, because he seemed to forget that he and so many members of his party are in favour of no capping at all on local government. His party's proposal would simply result in people paying far more than they do now for local services.

I enjoyed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon. He is an experienced accountant and we all found very interesting the convolutions that he highlighted. I look forward to his contributions to the report on tax simplification, which I am sure will serve the Government and other accountants well.

The hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) made a number of points, and I should like to pick up on two of them. He expressed concern about social housing. I assure him, however, that housing continues to benefit from substantial public capital investment. We are planning to spend more than £1 billion a year through the Housing Corporation and on housing association properties and, indeed, through the private finance initiative, which will bring new opportunities to housing and the construction industry as a whole. The Government have a target of a further 1.5 million home owners in the next 10 years. I hope that he is satisfied by those comments.

The hon. Gentleman's second point related to education. Education is the cornerstone of much of the Budget, and spending on schools is a top priority. The additional cash will be channelled through local authorities. My colleagues and I expect the local authorities to pass the money into the schools.

Having spent some years in local government, I am well aware of the complexity of the formulae that many local authorities use and of how they use that complexity to frighten parents. Many parents have been greatly worried about their schools' budgets. Many local authorities talk about cuts, but to give an example, it works like this: the reality is that it is a cut in a wish list. Thus, Madam Deputy Speaker, if you, for example, wanted a salary increase of £500 and received only £250, you would have a pay increase of £250. A local authority, however, would say that it had a £250 cut. That is the fallacy of the local authorities' argument. That is why their language is so wrong and why parents get so upset. It is why every hon. Member must get all the parents to ask their local authorities how they propose to spend the extra money for schools on their children.

I know that the hon. Member for North Devon at least has a policy. His party has a policy for a 1p increase in taxation for education. However, we have looked at his shadow Budget, which contains about £6 billion of extra expenditure. That is apparently going to be paid for by tax changes—they are not called tax increases—of £1.1 billion. Another item is tax reform to the tune of £900 million. In his shadow Budget, the hon. Gentleman has £6 billion of extra spending, which is to be financed by £2 billion from extra taxes, all brought about by a 1p increase in the basic rate. It is as confusing a mess as I have described it. We therefore have to take what he had to say with a great pinch of salt.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) spoke about the PSBR and made a number of detailed and complex points. Would he care to come and talk them over with me at a later date rather than in the Chamber tonight? I understand only too well his concerns about the need to reduce the borrowing requirement, and I agree that we should pull it back as fast as possible. He should not compare us too harshly with many of our European competitors, as we are the only country that has dealt with the pension problem properly. The finances of Germany and France show that if they do nothing about their pension schemes, their national debts will be about doubled. He should not have too many fears, as we are taking the right and prudent steps.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping)—I nearly called him my hon. Friend, as more often than our respective Front-Bench teams would like, we agree with each other on our local radio station—for not being present when he made his speech. I understand that he talked at some length about green issues. The Budget contains a 15 per cent. reduction on duty on road fuel gases. I hope that that will at least go some way to meeting his concerns about green issues.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) spoke about unemployment. I looked at the figures for his constituency, where unemployment has fallen by 11 per cent. compared with this time last year and by more than 20 per cent. compared with the end of 1992. I am sure that he, too, welcomes the general fall in unemployment in this country and the fact that the number of people in employment is now higher than it was in 1979.

In an enthusiastic speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) touched on many important points, of which the housing market was one. I am grateful for his comments. Average mortgage repayments are now about £180 a month. I do not think that many people would be able to rent a similar property at that price. My hon. Friend also mentioned the considerable need to look at long-term care issues. I hope that he feels that the changes that we have introduced in the Budget relating to the increase in disregards, the assistance for elderly people in general and, specifically, the tax relief on care insurance will go a long way to meeting not just his concerns, but those of prudent, elderly savers.

I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) is the owner of a vintage car, a betting man and no doubt likes a glass of whisky. I am therefore not too surprised that he had so much praise for the Budget. He rightly said that we are in a global economy, and he strongly supported Britain's aim to be the enterprise centre of Europe—a point also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon). He also mentioned lower interest rates—his views will probably have been heard by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor. But if my right hon.

and learned Friend missed them, I shall pass them on to him later—I am sure that they will also be passed on to the Governor of the Bank of England.

Low inflation and sound public finances are not an optional extra; they are necessary for a successful, expanding economy. Low inflation is essential because when inflation was high, it was the saver's enemy, the silent thief who stole the value of the pension. High inflation closed factories and took away jobs. That is why we have the 2.5 per cent. target. Underlying inflation has not been so low for so long since I was 11 years old. Compare that with 20 years ago, when inflation was running at 26 per cent. and it wiped out my grandfather's pension. That is why it is essential that inflation is low, and that is why it is one of our overriding aims.

We have a strong economy. Exports are good, business investment has picked up, consumers' expenditure is on a steady upward trend and unemployment has decreased by more than 700,000. No wonder Opposition Members always appear so unhappy.

In its recent report, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development praised the British economy. It spoke about the importance of the British economy and its strength. I compare that report with the so-called world prosperity league table that Opposition Members have been running round with. I can presume only that the reason why they go round with that bit of paper is that it is a fig leaf to cover the bareness of their economic policies.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: They do not have one.

Mrs. Knight: We are the party which did a competitiveness audit, not last week or last month, but some time ago. We are the ones who have put in place measures such as those in the Budget, to ensure that our companies can compete better, that we get people back into work and that more people enjoy the fruits of their labour. However, when one considers the league table that the Labour party has been running round with, it is evident that it is one small corner of a much larger picture.

I return to the OECD report. It says that the UK's economic performance in 1994 was impressive. It says that our economy has been made more flexible and competitive and less inflation prone. It goes on to say that monetary policy is working well. It says that economic prospects are good.

If we are to continue discussing league tables, let us draw attention to the following facts. We are at the top of the G7 growth league table. We are at the top of the EU job creation league table. We are at the top of the European productivity league table. We are at the top of the European league table for exports. We are at the top of the European employment league table. That is where we are. When will the Labour party stop running the country down?

It is always interesting to note that, whenever we ask the Labour party what its policies are, we get no answers. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham reminded us of some of the questions that we asked yesterday and to which there was no reply.

Let us have another go now. When will Labour Members give us their inflation target? When will they decide what they will support in the Budget? When will they decide whether they support a 20p tax on savings? When will they finally confess that adoption of the minimum wage and the social chapter would destroy jobs and investment?

The Opposition are sitting tight today, exactly as they have sat day after day when we have asked them questions. Either they do not reply because they do not know, or they do not reply because they will not reply.

In a letter that the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury, the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), sent to his colleagues, which was reported in the newspapers today, he told them that they must not imply that they will "manipulate public spending rules to smuggle through extra spending".

The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) said:

"Gordon can say anything he likes if he thinks it is going to win the Election . . . when Labour is in power"

it

"will be looking for other priorities"

apart

"from tax cuts."

There we have it. Labour smuggles through public expenditure, but does not tell anyone about it. In reality, Labour Back Benchers know what they want, and that is more spending, which means more taxation.

While the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien) was studying for his law degree and lecturing in universities, I was working in industry. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I worked in industry throughout the 1970s and 1980s, and during the 1970s Britain had a record that reads as follows. British industry was underinvested; we had an appalling strike record; we sold goods that no one wanted to buy at prices that rose weekly; the British Leyland work force was not buying the cars that it was making; inflation was rampant; in exports, we were losing our share of the world market. That was Labour's record. I say, "Never again!"

Interestingly, at that time when everything was wrong with the British economy, the political platitudes from the Labour party were exactly the same as they are today. That is the reality: it is an empty shell. As for the "7p up, 1p down" slogan, what nonsense! Not prepared to make difficult decisions—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Monday 4 December.

PETITION

10 pm

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): I beg leave to present a petition signed by 25,000 of my constituents, requesting urgent action to curb the crime of taking and using cars without the owners' consent, which has resulted in injury and death in our town. It states that the petitioners are

"outraged by the death of Neil Wright caused by joyriders and youths who take vehicles without the owners' consent."

They feel that tougher penalties must be introduced

"to prevent further death and tragedy."

The law in general must be reassessed. I hope that urgent consideration will be given to the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Police (Information Technology)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Burns.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak about this subject.

Since 1979, the Conservative Government have increased the number of police by 13,000, and have substantially improved police pay, conditions and equipment. Despite that, crime has risen—seemingly inexorably—for most of that time. The public say, "We want to see more police on the beat." Despite the best efforts of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, that is still the cry today.

I warmly welcome the Government's commitment to providing a further 5,000 police officers over the next three years. That will help to sustain the reduction in crime that has taken place over the past two years. We shall never be able to afford a police constable on every street corner, but the more that our police are visible to the public, the more the criminal will be deterred by the prospect of being caught and the more the public will be reassured.

In an age when criminals are equipped with fast stolen cars and mobile telephones, the police must spend much of their time in cars so that they can respond quickly. Each time that an arrest is made, the suspect must be taken to the police station and must then be laboriously processed in accordance with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which takes at least one extra officer off patrol or the beat for a long time. It is vital to the efficiency of the police that we make full use of information technology to improve detection and the rate of conviction and to reduce the amount of time spent on administration. That will reassure the public, deter the criminal and help to prevent crime.

Of course, the Government and the police are to be congratulated on many new initiatives. The first national computerised DNA data-base went live in Birmingham on 10 April this year, and represents a huge step forward. Phoenix, the criminal justice records service, will enable the police to enter directly on the police national computer the criminal record information that is currently provided on paper forms. The new Holmes system for the administration of major crime investigations should be available next year, and various other exciting information technology applications are undergoing trials in various police forces.

Less successful has been the attempt to achieve a national computerised fingerprint service. I shall not detail the problems that have arisen, particularly as litigation is still in progress, but it is important for those problems to be overcome so that a truly effective, easily accessible national fingerprint service can be provided for every police force.

The introduction of closed circuit television in many areas has been a great step forward, and I welcome the Government's commitment to increasing the number of CCTV schemes. In my constituency, the town of Barry benefits from a CCTV system, covering much of Holton road and Broad street. The system was purchased by [Mr. Walter Sweeney]

Vale of Glamorgan borough council with the help of a grant from the Welsh Office. It is operated by civilians at the civic offices.

Ideally, such systems should be bought and operated by police forces, not local authorities. That would have two advantages. First, the public would be reassured that there would be no abuse of their civil liberties. I understand that in the recent well-publicised case of a CCTV video being marketed and then withdrawn from sale the material used was from a private system operating in a shop, not from a public system. Still, it is important that the doubts of people who are genuinely concerned about an invasion of civil liberties be allayed. I therefore believe that CCTV should be under the exclusive control of the police, who must be responsible for storing and eventually erasing the tapes.

The second advantage of the police controlling the cameras would be ensuring minimum delay and avoiding any breakdown of communications in transmitting information from the person viewing the screen to the police officers required to attend the scene. Police officers, police cars and police stations need to be equipped with the latest technology.

Last year in the United States of America I was lucky enough to go out on patrol with a police officer in Seattle. His on-board computer system was linked to a national database covering all 51 states. He could instantly call up full details of a suspect vehicle, including where and when purchased, whether subject to hire purchase—and if so, how much—and who the registered owner was. That information made it easy to check whether the driver was the registered owner or was driving with his consent. The police officer could also call up details of any previous convictions of the registered owner and information about whether he was in breach of bail in any of the 51 states.

In our own comparatively small country our police patrol drivers should be given similar ready access to information. Furthermore, improved personal and vehicle radios should be introduced as standard equipment, with encryption systems in control rooms and individual sets so that criminals cannot listen in to police messages.

The equipment for processing suspects at most of our police stations is poor. At present, when a suspect is interviewed and charged, much valuable police time is wasted. In my experience as duty solicitor at Barry police station before I was elected to this House, I saw experienced police officers typing out charge sheets with two fingers on ancient manual typewriters. I understand that the system has slightly improved since my day, with word processors now in operation.

What is really needed is a national computer network. Standard software should be stipulated by the Home Office to enable an officer to retrieve a particular section of the Theft Act and then simply type in the relevant details, before producing a perfect and legible charge sheet every time. That would not only save the officer time; it would reduce subsequent problems and delays in amending charges. Information such as charge sheets, lists of previous convictions and advance disclosure could be transmitted to the court, the Crown Prosecution Service, the defence solicitors and the probation service—as necessary—electronically and at the touch of a button, thereby avoiding delays and reducing the need for court adjournments.

A great deal of time is currently spent by police officers and typists transcribing the relevant sections of recorded interviews. Entire interviews could be transcribed automatically using voice recognition systems, and then checked for accuracy against the tape. That would stop disputes about whether all the relevant sections of a tape had been transcribed; and it would usually avoid the need to bring tapes to court.

Computerised charge sheets and transcription facilities would help to put the interviewing officer back on the beat or on motorised patrol more quickly. The Home Office should also liaise with the Lord Chancellor's Department to ensure that court lists, warrants, witness summonses and production orders relating to prisoners are electronically transmitted and accessible to all who need them. The days of a prisoner not being produced at court at the right time because a production order has gone astray, or of a prisoner being bailed when he is already in breach of bail at another court, should be over.

My last and most important point is that the Home Office should take action to ensure that all police forces adopt the same computer system for the retrieval of central criminal records and the collection of local data. I am a strong supporter of local police forces rather than a national police force. However, it is plain crazy to allow forces to operate different computer systems which may be incompatible with those of neighbouring forces. In a huge murder hunt such as that for the Yorkshire Ripper, data collected in crimes in one area should be equally accessible by all police forces in case a pattern emerges that hastens the apprehension of the criminal.

Thanks to improved roads and cars, the criminal is more mobile than ever before. Much has been done to meet the increased threat. On 1 November last year, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary launched the first national blueprint for police use of computer technology, which stressed that police forces must act in partnership with each other and with other parts of the criminal justice system when using and buying new technology. That was certainly a big step in the right direction, but I would like the Home Secretary to go further.

The Home Office needs to consult all police forces, evaluate all the available equipment, commission new equipment where necessary and then initiate a central, standardised purchasing policy for all the equipment that I have mentioned. That would be expensive initially, but would save many hours of police and civilian time thereafter. It would lead to much greater efficiency and enable the police to spend more time out catching criminals, deterring crime and reassuring the public.

A central equipment purchasing policy operated by the Home Office would achieve economies through bulk purchase discounts and would guarantee compatibility between police forces. The pressure on local police budgets is such that only a central purchasing policy can ensure that all our police officers have the equipment they need to preserve the peace and maintain the reputation of the British bobby as the best in the world.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) for initiating tonight's debate on police information technology. He has long had an interest in this important subject. I am grateful also to my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth), who has been present throughout the debate. I know that he is also keen on this particular subject, hence his presence here tonight.

Immense opportunities are offered by technology in the ever more sophisticated fight against crime. The Government are committed to ensuring that the right technology is available to the police where and when it is needed. All forms of technology are being brought to bear in the constant fight against crime, and one area in which British technology is showing the way is the application of DNA techniques to crime detection.

The national DNA database went live in April 1995. The database is revolutionary. It is the first of its kind anywhere in the world and relies on leading-edge technology and up-to-date DNA techniques. I am delighted to announce that more than 100 hits have been made in the early months of operation, matching DNA profiles from individuals to profiles from traces left at scenes of crime, and profiles from traces left at one scene with those from another. The number of samples sent in by the police and the high number of profile matches already achieved bode well for the continuing success of the database.

Rapid access to information is the life-blood of operational policing and one of the key challenges facing the police service is how to take full advantage of the information technology revolution. The police are not newcomers to information technology. This year, the police national computer marks 21 years of service to the police community, and never has it been more relied on or more frequently used than it is now. In 1994, more than 47 million transactions were processed and 98 per cent. of customers considered the service to be either good or very good. However, the pace of change is quickening, and, even in the past year, several important milestones have been achieved.

Police effectiveness depends on the accuracy of the information that is available and also on how quickly it can be obtained and subsequently updated. To this end, Phoenix, a new database on the police national computer, became operational in May 1995. It allows the police to enter and retrieve records of arrests and convictions for all reportable offences directly rather than having to rely on the microfiche collection held at the national identification service. Phoenix will eventually be linked directly to the courts, the Crown Prosecution Service and the rest of the criminal justice service. That will ensure that records of convictions are promptly updated and that the judiciary has immediate access to the information on previous convictions which it requires for sentencing purposes.

The extremely complex task of transferring the microfiche records held by the NIS to Phoenix is now under way, and when complete it will form the kernel of a database of immense operational value to the police. I was delighted that we were able to invite forces to begin to enter records of cautions on to the system from 1 November. Until now, records of cautions have mainly been kept only by the force which issued them. In future they will also be available nationally.

We have a substantial programme of enhancements for Phoenix, which has been agreed with the police service. The first and most important of the enhancements will be QUEST, a database analysis facility that will allow investigators to search the collection for all offenders meeting particular descriptions. It will be a real advance in the investigation of serious crime.

Within a few more years, Phoenix will be linked to NAFIS, the national automated fingerprint identification system, which will provide the forces of England and Wales with a world-class system for the identification of offenders. NAFIS will incorporate the national fingerprint collection of over 5 million records, including those from cautioned offenders. It will be rolled out to the national identification service and eight pilot forces from the middle of 1997 and will achieve national coverage, replacing all existing fingerprint matching systems, by the year 2001. NAFIS will be a distributed system that will use police national network services for data communications. Common data and system services will be co-located with the police national computer.

What is the police national network? It is already in place as the communications backbone for the new developments to which I have referred. It provides a telephone network in addition to a data packet service and is tailored, as is Phoenix, to the needs of the police and to those of the wider criminal justice community. Provided by Mercury, the PNN is an excellent example of the way in which co-operation between the public and private sectors can work to the benefit of all.

Improved radio communications are a must for busy operational offices. The public safety radio communications project has been created to replace existing police service radio systems with the latest state-of-the-art digital technology and common European standards. It is envisaged that the systems will use new frequency bands reserved for public safety organisations throughout the European Union. After consultation with the Association of Chief Police Officers, the project will proceed to the next phase and directly involve the private sector via the private finance initiative.

The new systems will offer many advantages. Harmonised European frequencies will substantially reduce continental interference and high-grade encryption will see an end to illegal monitoring of police broadcasts. Mobile data facilities will allow access to remote databases such as criminal records and vehicle information. My hon. Friend the Minister for Vale of Glamorgan will be pleased to know that trials are already taking place in which radios in police vehicles are being linked to the police national computer. These developments will lead to more efficient and effective management of police resources. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester will be interested to know that video cameras in police cars could be linked to the police national computer.

In addition to these centrally provided services, a wide range of computing applications are already installed in forces. We must ensure that the overall investment in police information technology, which is running at some £150 million a year, is used as effectively as it possibly can be. In this new technological age, the somewhat artificial boundary between the centrally provided systems—the PNC, NAFIS and the PNN—and all the local systems will disappear. We now need to think about links between systems as much as the systems themselves if the full benefits are to be realised. That is why, at the end of last year, the Home Secretary launched the first ever national strategy for police information systems—unfortunately nicknamed NATSPIS. This blueprint will ensure the development of cost-effective standard systems which meet the needs of all forces and will communicate with each other whenever necessary. That strategy is fully supported by chief constables and police authorities and is being driven forward by lead forces, which will develop standard systems with support from the centre.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan will be pleased to know that work on the top five priority applications—command and control, custody, management information, case preparation and crime reporting—is already under way. The case preparation application to be used by all forces will be linked to case management systems within other criminal justice organisations, such as the courts and the Crown Prosecution Service. Information fields available will include details of the availability of police officers and witnesses. That should help to reduce the number of adjournments and delays caused by the lack of relevant information in the courts. On a wider front, the initiative on co-ordination of computerisation in the criminal justice system—CCCJS—seeks to improve communications throughout the criminal justice system through the use of appropriate technology. Recent pilot projects involve links between the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, Swansea, and Reading magistrates court and links between the DVLA and Dyfed Powys police for the direct provision of driver information and electronic mail links between various agencies in Suffolk and Hampshire including, on a test basis, solicitors and barristers in private practice.

My hon. Friend mentioned that improved methods for transcribing tape-recorded interviews should be considered. A working party comprising representatives of ACPO, the CPS and the Home Office is currently examining a number of alternative methods of passing details of police interviews to other agencies in the criminal justice system. That will include consideration of the feasibility of voice recognition computer technology. Independent research commissioned by the Home Office has demonstrated that records of taped interviews prepared by trained civilian summarisers cost less, are more accurate, and of a higher overall quality than those prepared by police officers with two fingers and the old Remington, which my hon. Friend mentioned. Following this research, the efficiency scrutiny which was published in July recommended that all forces should prepare and implement a programme to employ civilian summarisers.

I come now to the new police information technology organisation—PITO. There can be no doubt that the strategy heralds a new era in police computing and it demands some business process re-engineering to the way we do business in central Government. That is why we are considering proposals to set up a new police information technology organisation to take over from the current science and technology group in the Home Office. That will be the new centralised purchasing organisation, but the police will be in the driving seat, not the bureaucrats or me.

That new organisation will bring the police into the centre of decision making and allow both local and national developments to be looked at as an integrated whole. We propose to set up PITO next year on an interim basis with its own chief executive and advisory council on which the police service and police authorities will be represented, and then to move it on to a fully independent executive non-departmental public body as soon as we can find time for the necessary legislation. Those changes in strategies and structures will help us to maintain and co-ordinate momentum in a rapidly changing world. Division between police departments, forces and criminal justice agencies have to be transcended. Only if we are all working to a common end will we be able to turn the strategy into a reality.

In addition, as the whole House must agree, to this impressive set of computing and communications developments, other forms of technology are making a huge contribution to police effectiveness and public safety. Nowhere is technology moving faster than in the world of closed circuit television. There cannot be many people who have not noticed the recent spread of those watchful guardians. High streets, shopping centres, industrial estates, schools, villages, community centres and other areas have all benefited from the presence of the cameras. The police have embraced the new technology enthusiastically, sometimes running their own systems, but more often working in partnership with others such as local authorities or town centre management committees. CCTV is overwhelmingly popular, with the operators, the police and the general public.

I have seen the video that was issued earlier this week, "Caught in the Act". I can tell the House that it is of poor quality and hyped up by the producer to try to whet the appetites of a gullible public to buy it. I totally deplore the misuse of any CCTV material for unauthorised purposes, even poor-quality stuff like that, which will strain one's eyes if one tries to watch it. We strongly recommend that every CCTV system should have a code of practice. The bidding guidance for the CCTV competition, which was announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary recently, with £15 million of taxpayers' money to be bid for, makes it clear that each scheme must have a code of practice to guard against unauthorised disclosure of material.

There is no doubt that CCTV helps to prevent crime. It helps the police to detect crime. It assists with the investigation of crime. It gives the police extra, incontrovertible evidence to help prosecute and convict more criminals and—I know that my hon. Friends are particularly concerned about this point—it reduces the fear of crime among the general public. It also has other, less serious social benefits, such as finding lost children, spotting fires in the early stages and identifying people who have been taken ill on the street.

The results speak for themselves. My hon. Friend has already mentioned how the town of Barry benefits from CCTV. There are examples of crime reductions from all over the country. I shall give just a few of the most up-to-date cases. In the four years since the Newcastle scheme has been running, in the city centre there have been 6,200 fewer crimes. There have been 800 arrests due to the cameras, and in only six cases did the suspects plead not guilty. They were still found guilty.

In Swansea, in the year up to August 1994, there were 147 instances of taking from a motor vehicle. After the cameras were installed in December 1994 and up until August 1995, there have been just 10. In Northampton, there has been a 57 per cent. reduction in crime since the cameras were installed. In Berwick-upon-Tweed, a small town with a small-scale, four-camera system, burglary is down 69 per cent., criminal damage is down 41 per cent., and theft is down 24 per cent.

I could go on, but I will not. Everywhere that CCTV has been installed can give similar reports. CCTV works. As John Stevens, the excellent chief constable of Northumbria said recently:

"We are leading the world in CCTV technology and its use. In every case where cameras have been installed, crime has dropped and the number of arrests increased."

We in the Government are doing our bit to help. Last year, we initiated a CCTV challenge competition, which eventually distributed £5 million to help fund 106 additional schemes throughout the country. That levered in £13.8 million of private and local council finance. Now we have announced another competition. This time we are offering a total of £15 million and we hope that we can fund at least 300 schemes.

Individually, each of those systems and services is impressive and offers the police service many benefits, but, taken together, the contribution that the whole portfolio of information technology projects will make to operational policing will be much greater than the sum of its parts. The police service is spending £750 million on IT over the current five-year period. We are committed to helping the service to gain the maximum value from that huge investment, and to ensure that it will play its full part in the vital task of making our communities safer places.

I thank my hon. Friend once again for enabling me to tell the House tonight of the exciting developments that are taking place in the British police service, the finest service in the world.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock till Monday 4 December, pursuant to Order.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Terrorist Suspects (Interviews)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will amend the terms of reference for the Independent Commissioner for the Holding Centres to permit the deputy commissioner to be present at interviews with terrorist suspects in the police offices. [309]

Sir John Wheeler: Following discussions with the Royal Ulster Constabulary, I have today placed in the Library of the House revised terms of reference for the Independent commissioner for the Holding Centres to permit his deputy to be present at interviews with terrorist suspects in the police offices, subject to certain caveats agreed by both the commissioner and the RUC. The change will come into effect on 1 December 1995.

This change in the role of the deputy commissioner will further assure the public that those persons detained in the holding centres continue to be properly treated in accordance with their legal rights and the standards required by the relevant codes of practice.

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if an addendum to the outline railway safety case for the channel tunnel rail link has been prepared for the additional provisions to the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill deposited in the House last week. [4]

Mr. Watts: Union Railways has, in consultation with the Health and Safety Executive, prepared an addendum to the outline railway safety case for the channel tunnel rail link for the additional provisions to the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill that were deposited last week. The addendum covers the additional provisions for the Barking extended tunnel; A13 services diversions; Mardyke Park realignment; and the Eurotunnel railway connection. It also covers a prospective additional provision for access arrangements between Northfleet station and the proposed station at Ebbsfleet. That additional provision may be deposited next month. I am arranging for copies of the addendum to be placed in the House Library.

Similar documentation will also be prepared for the additional provisions that I hope will be deposited in Parliament next month. I will ensure that that material is also placed in the House Library.

HEALTH

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the outcome of the review of the Medicines Control Agency; and if will make a statement. [360]

Mr. Sackville: The first evaluation study of the work of the Medicines Control Agency since its establishment as an agency, and the prior options study for its future operation, have recently been completed.

The evaluation study concludes that the MCA has been successful in safeguarding public health through the effective control of the sale and supply of pharmaceuticals in the United Kingdom. While maintaining the high level of public protection required for pharmaceuticals licensed for use in the UK, the MCA has provided a much improved service to the pharmaceutical industry and is now acknowledged as the fastest licensing authority in the world.

The prior options study concluded that abolition, privatisation and the contracting out of the MCA's core function are neither practical nor feasible. It notes, however, that some support functions might beneficially be placed on a contractual basis. It confirms the practical and legal requirement for a UK regulatory authority and proposes that UK Ministers should remain responsible for its core work. The work and the workload of the agency are expected to change over the coming years because of the implications of the new European systems for the regulation of pharmaceuticals. Until the impact of these new systems can be properly assessed, the report confirms that the executive agency model operating as a trading fund continues to represent the best organisational framework for the MCA.

I support the findings of the evaluation study and the prior options study, the results of which will feed into the revision of the agency's framework document which is now in hand.

I have today placed a summary of the reviews' findings in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Wildlife Law Enforcement

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the Government's response to the report of the enforcement working group "Wildlife Law Enforcement". [1]

Mr. Clappison: Following our review of secondary wildlife controls last year, the Government gave a commitment to improving the enforcement of domestic wildlife controls. The enforcement working group was set up to look at what practical steps might be taken to achieve this. I welcome the main recommendations in the enforcement working group's report.

We are today launching the next phase of our crackdown on wildlife crime by setting up a new "Partnership for Action Against Wildlife Crime". The first meeting of the partnership's steering group is taking place today. The main task of this new forum will be to provide a strategic overview of wildlife law enforcement activity in England and Wales, and to improve co-ordination and communication between all the organisations involved. It will be responsible for following up the recommendations in the enforcement working group report, and by providing expertise, experience and advice, should make a valuable contribution to the development of wildlife law enforcement policy.

The police have agreed to continue to chair the group jointly with my Department. The group will also need to respond to other interests and opinions. I have therefore invited the founder members to co-opt other members, including those representing countryside and sporting interests.

One of the main objectives of the group will be to support the network of police wildlife liaison officers, which is the cornerstone of wildlife law enforcement activity. The network has grown steadily since its inception in the early 1980s, with virtually all police forces in the UK now having one or more police wildlife liaison officers. Few of these officers are engaged full time on this work and many are volunteers performing wildlife duties in addition to their many other tasks. It is important for the network to be retained and, where necessary, strengthened.

DNA testing and other forensic techniques have an important part to play in combating wildlife crime. There have recently been a number of successful prosecutions based on DNA blood sampling evidence, and we will continue to promote and support the use of forensic techniques in wildlife cases.

The enforcement working group identified a number of weaknesses in the powers of the police to investigate wildlife offences, and sought tougher and more consistent penalties for wildlife crime. We will seek to identify legal remedies which will command general support within the next 12 months.

I can also make further announcements today about practical actions which I am taking against wildlife crime.

First, we have appointed the Laboratory of the Government Chemist to prepare practical advice for all police and other enforcement authorities about the application of DNA techniques to wildlife crime. This will include sampling kits, and we expect to issue the full package in May next year.

Secondly, over the next three years, we shall be sponsoring further innovative research into DNA and wildlife crime. This will be aimed at projects which can establish tests for further species—such as tigers—or for different materials such as feathers and hair.

Thirdly, my Department is making resources available immediately to finance a practitioners' guide to wildlife law. This is a key recommendation of the enforcement working group, and will be of particular use to the police and other agencies in their fight against wildlife crime.

Those involved in wildlife crime should be in no doubt that we are determined to do everything possible to ensure that they are vigorously pursued and properly punished.

Coastal Policy

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to issue the proposed statement of policy guidelines for the coast. [2]

Mr. Clappison: Reflecting the importance of promoting effective management of the coastal zone, the Department of the Environment is today making available "Policy Guidelines for the Coast", which draws together in concise form a wider range of guidance and other information on coast-related issues in England. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Libraries of the House, and the guidelines will be extensively distributed to interested organisations and individuals.

Mineral Dredging

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what conclusions he has come to concerning the review of licensing arrangements for mineral dredging in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [3]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that we have today published our conclusions on the review. After consideration of all the representations and consultation with other Government Departments, we have decided that the way forward is to introduce statutory procedures to replace the non-statutory "Government View" procedure. The decision follows our conclusions that:

> a statutory system, which will draw on procedures in the town and country planning Acts, should be introduced, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales as regulatory and enforcement authorities. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be consulted in the decision-making process and will have responsibility for overseeing the monitoring of the effects of the dredging activities; > the costs of administering the new statutory procedures should be recovered from dredging application fees;
> in general, new dredging permissions should be valid for 15 years with substantive reviews at five-year intervals to determine renewal;
> the statutory procedures should subsume sections 18 and 34 consents under the Coast Protection Act 1949; and > all areas of the sea bed below the low-water mark will be covered regardless of ownership.

A summary of the responses to the consultation paper and an outline of the proposed statutory procedures have been placed in the House Library. Until we can introduce proposals for legislation to this House, we propose to introduce similar non-statutory procedures as an interim measure. A further announcement will be made about this.

We will also be preparing and consulting on policy guidance for marine dredging which will set out the environmental criteria appropriate to the marine environment.

Rent Officer Service

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to change the arrangements for the administration of the rent officer service in England. [971]

Mr. Curry: In the light of the scrutiny report published in 1992 and the subsequent work by my Department and by consultants, I have concluded that there is a case for introducing new arrangements for the administration of the rent officer service in England based on a unified national management structure.

Before making a decision, and following the procedure set out in "Continuity and Change", Cm 2627, I propose to undertake a prior options review, in particular to consider and make recommendations on:

(i) whether the functions discharged by rent officers under the Rent Act 1977 and orders made under the Housing Act 1988 should continue to be performed in the public sector;

(ii) the scope for contracting out; and

(iii) subject to the conclusion on (i) and (ii), the strength of the case for changing to unified management structure; and

(iv) subject to (iii), the relative merits of achieving this by establishing a next steps agency within the civil service or an independent public sector body, based either on an existing or a newly created organisation.

The review will be undertaken by my Department in conjunction with the Treasury, the Office of Public Service and the Department of Social Security. There will be an opportunity for interested bodies to submit views.

English Partnerships

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress made by English Partnerships in promoting inward investment and in its regeneration role more generally. [972]

Mr. Curry: English Partnerships has played a key role in helping to secure a succession of major inward investment projects during the last 12 months, involving Samsung, Sony, Ford-Jaguar and Siemens. These projects alone will attract over £2 billion of investment into the UK economy and create up to 7,000 jobs. In addition, English Partnerships has been instrumental in other smaller inward investment projects throughout England, which have made positive impacts on local economies and communities.

It is now two years since the Government launched English Partnerships as the main focus of land and building regeneration in England. In July, English Partnerships published its 1994–95 annual report, covering its first full financial year of operations. Copies of the report are available in the Library. It records that English Partnerships successfully implemented a £225 million regeneration programme, attracting some £300 million of private investment, potentially creating over 13,000 jobs and reclaiming 4,200 acres of land.

English Partnerships' concern to secure sustainable economic regeneration has been demonstrated through its commitment to major mixed use development schemes to revitalise urban districts such as Hulme in Manchester and Barking Reach, the first major project in the Thames gateway area.

English Partnerships has also demonstrated a strong commitment to voluntary and community organisations, recognising the importance of their contribution to local regeneration. As well as promoting community involvement in major projects, English Partnerships has established a special fund, the community investment fund, to provide capital funding for smaller community-led projects. It is also continuing for a second year its partnership with the Groundwork Trust to promote smaller reclamation projects which improve the local environment.

PRIME MINISTER

Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the recent Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting held in New Zealand.

The Prime Minister: With my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, I attended the meeting of Commonwealth Heads of Government in New Zealand on 10 to 13 November.

I have placed in the Library of the House the text of the Auckland Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting—CHOGM—communiqué and an action plan for the fulfilment of the Harare declaration. Statements were also issued on Nigeria and disarmament.

Commonwealth Heads of Government warmly welcomed President Mandela, representing South Africa for the first time following the country's transition to a multi-racial democracy; and President Biya, following the recent admission of Cameroon as the 52nd member of the Commonwealth.

The meeting rightly took issue with those members of the Commonwealth, notably Nigeria, which continue to defy the principles of democratic and accountable government agreed at the CHOGM in Harare in 1991. The Commonwealth's widespread and increasing concern about the importance of an early transition to accountable democratic government in Nigeria, and the Nigerian Government's callous execution of Mr. Ken Saro-Wiwa and his eight associates, following a flawed judicial process with no formal right of appeal and no regard for the basic legal rights of defendants, gave the Commonwealth little alternative but to suspend Nigeria. This was essential if the Harare principles were to carry credibility for the future.

How long Nigeria remains suspended depends on its own conduct. If the Nigerian Government show themselves willing to abide by the Harare principles, the Commonwealth will be very ready to support them. Conversely, the meeting agreed that if no democratic progress has been made within a time frame to be stipulated, Nigeria will be expelled from the Commonwealth.

To monitor implementation of the Harare declaration more generally, the meeting decided to establish a standing group of eight Commonwealth Foreign Ministers, in which my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary will participate.

The United Kingdom and other members differed over the resumption of French nuclear testing in the Pacific. I said that I recognised the strong views of countries in the region. But I also stressed my determination to defend strongly the principles and policies of deterrence which have helped to keep the UK peaceful and free for the past half century. The Commonwealth's statement on disarmament was misrepresentative, and in parts clearly wrong on nuclear weapons testing. I was not therefore prepared to be associated with it. At the same time, I underlined that the UK shared with Commonwealth partners the desire for an early end to testing, in the south Pacific or elsewhere. Hence the UK's commitment to concluding a comprehensive test ban treaty and signing the protocols to the treaty of Rarotonga in the first half of next year.

On Hong Kong, Commonwealth Heads endorsed our view that the rule of law and a high degree of autonomy are important ingredients for Hong Kong's continuing success after 1997.

Commonwealth Heads agreed to accept Mozambique's application to join, which was championed by President Mandela and leaders of other Southern African Commonwealth states, in view of Mozambique's previous links with the Commonwealth. The meeting also agreed that an intergovernmental group should report on criteria for any future applications.

I invited Commonwealth leaders to hold their next meeting in 1997 in Britain. This invitation was warmly accepted.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

National Food Stockpile

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made towards liquidation of the national food stockpile; and if he will make a statement. [525]

Mrs. Browning: The national food stockpile originally consisted of flour, biscuits, sugar, fat, yeast, sweets and emergency feeding equipment stored in buffer depots around the country, to provide a reserve to help feed survivors during a recovery period after a nuclear attack. Following a phased reduction of activities after 1991, an announcement was made in March 1993 to liquidate the stockpile. This was possible because an assessment of food supplies in the context of modern distribution and storage practices within the food industry had concluded that there would be ample stocks available to meet any conceivable attack. Remaining foodstuffs have since been disposed of and the last buffer depot has recently been closed.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Departmental Staff

Mr. Luff: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the number of staff in post in central Government Departments at 1 October. [1136]

Mr. Horam: On 1 October 1995 there were 506,300 permanent staff in post in central Government. This represents a decrease of 5 per cent. in the year since 1 October 1994. The number of casual staff fell by 1 per cent. over the year to 19,200.

Estimates have been made, and broken down by Department, for 1 October 1994 and placed with the 1 October 1995 figures in the Library.

TRANSPORT

Transport Research Laboratory

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what bids he has received in the sale of the Transport Research Laboratory, and if he will make a statement. [1249]

Mr. Norris: Several initial bids were received for the Transport Research Laboratory. Two shortlisted bidders have been invited to submit best and final offers by 21 December. They are a consortium comprising Pell Frischmann Consulting Engineers Ltd., Mouchel Associates Ltd., the Automobile Association, and the Royal Automobile Club, and the Transport Research Foundation, which includes members of TRL's existing management and is bidding to acquire TRL as a non-profit distributing company. The Government will announce their decision on the selected purchaser early in the new year.

Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what DVLA's vehicle excise duty enforcement performance has been since 1993–94, and what revenue has been raised. [1248]

Mr. Norris: The information is as follows:

	1993–94	1994–95
Successfully completed cases	455,000	458,000
Revenue raised	£46 million	£46.5 million
Induced relicensing as a result of enforcement action	241,000	255,000
Revenue raised	£19 million	£22 million
Yield to cost ratio	2.56:1	2.66:1

Previously quoted figures on the number of motorists induced to relicense and the revenue raised—345,000/£28 million and 388,000/£33 million for 1993–94 and 1994–95 respectively—were incorrect. This was the result of a programming error.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Daresbury and Rutherford Appleton Laboratories

Mr. Brazier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the forthcoming prior options studies of the Daresbury and Rutherford Appleton laboratories. [1535]

Mr. Lang: The Government announced on 29 September 1995 that all public sector research establishments would be subject to prior options reviews and that a timetable would be made available shortly.

The Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils' Daresbury and Rutherford Appleton laboratories will be reviewed immediately. Other research council research establishments will be reviewed in the course of 1996. It is essential that all the establishments are looked at in this round of reviews, in order to have a comprehensive look at the establishments as a piece.

Bearing in mind the extensive studies carried out prior to establishing CCLRC, the forthcoming review is likely to draw extensively on this material and a particular emphasis of the review will be on the relationship with other public sector research establishments.

I would welcome comments from interested parties. Comments should be sent by 8 January 1996 to:

Jeremy Clark, Office of Science and Technology, Albany House, 94–98 Petty France, London SW1H 9ST.

Accreditation Service

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total amount of the pre-paid fees liability to be transferred from the National Measurement Accreditation Service to the United Kingdom Accreditation Service. [1252]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The closing accounts have now been completed showing the total liability as £1,119,804. A first payment of £670,000 was made on 2 August and a second payment of £449,804 on 16 November.

Parliamentary approval for this new service will be sought in a winter supplementary estimate for the Department of Trade and Industry's programmes and administration vote, class IV, vote 1. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of the above amount is being met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

National Physical Laboratory

Mr. Jessel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what financial arrangements have been put in place with

Serco consequent upon the transfer of the National Physical Laboratory to private sector management. [1137]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Payments to Serco will be made for work carried out for DTI customers; there is no separate management fee. However, certain non-recurring costs were taken out during the negotiating process and were paid at the start of the contract. This involved my Department making a payment of £1.55 million to Serco. This arrangement offered significantly better value for money for my Department than the alternative of including these costs in the prices that will be charged to DTI customers.

Approval of this new service will be sought in a winter supplementary estimate for the Department of Trade and Industry's programmes and administration vote (class IV, vote 1). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of £1.55 million has been met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

Gas Industry Licensing Framework

Mr. Coe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements have been made for the introduction of the new licensing framework for the gas industry. [1135]

Mr. Lang: The Director General of Gas Supply is setting in motion the necessary arrangements to introduce new licences from the appointed day. This involves urgent expenditure on consultancy, staff and accommodation to meet the requirements of the new gas legislation.

Parliamentary approval to expenditure on this new service has been sought in the winter supplementary estimate for the Office of Gas Supply vote, class IV, vote 10. Urgent expenditure, in advance of that approval and Royal Assent to the Gas Bill, estimated at £875,000 has been met by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund.

British Coal

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what change he has made to British Coal's external financing limit for 1995–96. [1251]

Mr. Lang: British Coal's external financing limit has been adjusted from £35 million to £59 million, to reflect the continuing management by British Coal of various ex-employee liabilities which are not expected to pass to Government until 1997.

Pool Reinsurance Co. Ltd.

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will authorise Pool Reinsurance Co. Ltd. to change the arrangements for paying terrorism insurance premiums in 1996. [1250]

Mr. Nelson: I have agreed that premiums in 1996 will be discounted by 20 per cent., provided good claims experience continues.

The provision for paying a deposit premium of 60 per cent. of the discounted annual premium at the beginning of the policy period, with the balance becoming due at the end of the period, will be continued. As at present, the balance will be waived if good claims experience continues. The threshold of the total level of claims notified to Pool Reinsurance Co. Ltd. during the year at which the waiver would be withdrawn will be increased for 1996 from £50 million to £75 million.

The instalment provision and the discount will be withdrawn in respect of subsequent new or renewed policies in the course of the year should losses exceed £75 million.

Arrangements for 1997 will be determined in the light of experience.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Movement

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the grants his Department (a) has made and (b) proposes to make to the European movement in 1995. [78]

Mr. David Davis: No grants have been made to the European movement in 1995, nor are any planned.

EU Council Meeting

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the voting record of each member state on items agreed at the meeting of the European Community's Foreign Affairs Council held on 30 October; and if he will make it his practice to include details of all votes, including where there have been no votes, in the future. [442]

Mr. David Davis: No votes were taken at the Foreign Affairs Council of 30 October. A record of votes taken at Foreign Affairs Councils is generally given in the Council secretariat press release which is deposited in the Library of the House as soon as it is available.

GCHQ (Signals Station)

Mr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of GCHQ composite tracking station at Culmhead. [459]

Mr. Rifkind: On 14 November the director of GCHQ announced that the composite signals organisation station at Culmhead will close in 1999.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much has been spent on re-equipping GCHQ composite tracking station at Culmhead in each of the last five years. [460]

Mr. Rifkind: It is not Government policy publicly to reveal details of expenditure on intelligence beyond that shown in the single intelligence vote. Expenditure by the intelligence services is kept under review by the Committee of Parliamentarians established under the Intelligence Services Act 1994.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances his Department allows access to confidential information held about asylum seekers to (a) the Child Support Agency and (b) other Government Departments or agencies. [619]

Mr. Kirkhope: Details of an asylum claim are treated as confidential. The fact that a person is an asylum seeker is, however, disclosed where necessary in order to protect public funds, in particular where entitlement to a benefit or service is conditional on asylum seeker status. Disclosure is regularly made to the Benefits Agency and local authority housing departments for this purpose. Information about an asylum claim is not disclosed to departments or agencies not involved in consideration of the claim, such as the Child Support Agency, otherwise than in exceptional circumstances, for example where the police require it for the purposes of a criminal investigation.

Nigerians

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of Nigerian nationals who, over the last five years to date, have been granted (a) refugee status and (b) exceptional leave to remain by the United Kingdom authorities. [107]

Mr. Kirkhope: In the first 10 months of 1995, two Nigerians were granted asylum and three were refused asylum but granted exceptional leave to remain. Annual information prior to 1995 is published in tables 3.1 and 3.2 of the Home Office Statistical Bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15/95. A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department following the suspension of Nigeria from the Commonwealth, when he intends to notify the Secretary of State for Social Security that Nigeria is a country undergoing significant upheaval for the purposes of enabling Nigerian nationals, whose application for political asylum in the United Kingdom is pending appeal, to a special adjudicator, to claim benefit; and if he will make a statement. [217]

Mr. Kirkhope: The situation in Nigeria is being closely monitored, but my right hon. and learned Friend does not at present consider that it would justify his issuing such a notification. Under the proposals on which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has been consulting, benefit entitlement arising from a notification in respect of a country would lapse at the point where an asylum claim was refused and would not continue during any appeal.

Gambling

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to lift the ban covering the use of radio and television by the betting industry for the purpose of advertising its service. [502]

Mr. Kirkhope: Restrictions on the advertising of betting and other forms of commercial gambling in the broadcast and non-broadcast media are under review. There will be full public consultation before any decisions are made.

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment has been made of the impact of the national lottery on the betting industry; and if he will make a statement. [508]

Mr. Kirkhope: We are monitoring off-course betting turnover in order to assess the impact of the national lottery on the horserace betting levy, and plan to report our findings to Parliament in the spring of 1996.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to set up bodies to investigate miscarriages of justice. [407]

Mr. Kirkhope: Work is already underway to establish the criminal cases review commission created by the Criminal Appeal Act 1995. It is expected to start work in the course of next year.

Doncaster Prison

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will supply to the hon. Member for Don Valley copies of all the annual reports of the prison board of visitors in respect of Doncaster prison. [63]

Miss Widdecombe: The board of visitors appointed to Doncaster prison started its term of office in June 1994 when the prison was first opened. As annual reports are submitted after the end of the year to which the report refers, the board has therefore submitted only one annual report, for 1994. Its annual report for 1995 will not be due until spring 1996.

Boards of visitors annual reports are not published documents. They are made to the Secretary of State who permits the board, if it wishes, to publish its report. In this case, the board has chosen not to publish. Instead it issued a press notice, a copy of which will be sent to the hon. Member.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he received the first annual report from the chairman of the board of visitors of Doncaster prison; and on what date this will be published by his Department. [403]

Miss Widdecombe: The board of visitors appointed to Doncaster prison started its term of office in June 1994 when the prison was first opened. As annual reports are submitted after the end of the year to which the report refers, the board has therefore submitted only on annual report, for 1994. This was received on 12 June 1995.

Boards of visitors annual reports are not published documents. They are made to he Secretary of State who permits the board, if it wishes, to publish its report. In this case, the board has chosen not to publish. Instead it issued a press notice, a copy of which will be sent to the hon. Member.

Prison Service

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department further to the letters of the director general to the hon. Member for Don Valley dated 24 and 26 October, on what basis Mr. Richard Tilt is authorised to sign himself as Director General of the Prison Service; and if he will make a statement. [53]

Miss Widdecombe: On the basis that, my right hon. and learned Friend, as he told the House on 16 October, has asked Mr. Tilt to take over temporarily as director general until a substantive appointment is made.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the 137 full submissions referred to in the letter of resignation of Mr. Derek Lewis, the former Director General of the Prison Service, which the Prison Service was required to submit to his Department between October 1994 and January 1995, together with the name of the addressees; and if he will make a statement. [56]

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 26 October, Official Report column 759.

DEFENCE

Munitions (Dumping at Sea)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if his Department will list the weapons material dumped in Hurd Deep in the English channel; [613]

(2) if his Department will give details of the sea dumping disposal programme conducted by his Department in the dumping site 400 miles south-west of Lands End; [614]

(3) what records relating to chemical weapons and munitions dumping operations in Hurd Deep until 1973 and off the continental shelf until January 1993 exist in his Department. [615]

Mr. Soames: No chemical warfare munitions were disposed of at these sites. Details of sea disposals of CW munitions were provided in my previous answer of 20 October 1995, Official Report, col 387. In the immediate post war period approximately 25,000 tons of British and 50,000 tons of captured German conventional munitions were dumped at Hurd Deep but no record of subsequent dumping operations at this site until its use was discontinued in 1973 appear to have survived. Surviving records which have been identified to date show that between 1973 and 1985 up to 2,000 tons of conventional munitions were disposed of annually at the deep water dump site situated approximately 400 miles south west of Lands End, off the continental shelf. From 1985 until October 1992 when the sea dumping of munitions was terminated the annual disposals were as follows, 904 tons; 1,882 tons; 1,565 tons; 3,244 tons; 1,544 tons; 1,775 tons; 1,093 tons and 8,764 tons.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is his assessment of the legality of the 1976 emergency dump in Beaufort's dyke in relation to the Oslo convention for the prevention of marine pollution by dumping from ships and aircraft; [612]

(2) if he will list the weapons material dumped during the 1976 emergency dump in Beaufort's dyke in the North sea. [611]

Mr. Soames: The emergency MOD disposal in 1976 involved two cases of heavily corroded 40mm shells. The emergency dumping of certain waste materials subject to the provisions of the Oslo convention is permissible if the waste in question cannot be disposed of on land without "unacceptable danger or damage". Given their recorded condition, the disposal of these munition items on land would have constituted such an "unacceptable danger".

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has to monitor the chemical weapons and munitions dumping sites in the sea surrounding the British Isles. [610]

Mr. Soames: My Department has no plans to monitor disused munition dump sites.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the date of the last sea-dumping by his Department of surplus ordnance off the British Isles. [446]

Mr. Soames: My Department ceased all sea-dumping of conventional ammunition and explosive stocks in October 1992 in line with the OSPAR convention which came into force on 1 January 1993.

Ships for Sale

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, if he will list all the (a) surface ships and (b) submarines currently on the market for sale by his Department. [462]

Mr. Arbuthnot:

(a) Surface ships on the market for sale

West Freugh Range

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the explosions, together with their dates, which have occurred at his Department's West Freugh military range in the last two years; [214]

(2) what activities are carried out at his Department's West Freugh military range; [216]

(3) if an investigation has been carried out into the explosion at his Department's West Freugh military range on 19 October; and if he will make a statement. [215]

Mr. Arbuthnot: These matters are for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the chief executive, DERA to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Dr. David Clark, dated 20 November 1995:

Your three questions regarding activities at the West Freugh range and the recent accidental explosion on 19 October have been passed to me to reply as Chief Executive of the Defence Research and Evaluation Agency (DERA) which includes the West Freugh site as part of the Defence Test and Evaluation Organisation (DTEO) division of the Agency. I am responding to all three questions in this letter.

You asked for details of the activities carried out at the West Freugh site for a list of explosions that had occurred there in the last two years. The DTEO Weapons Range at West Freugh offers the capability to undertake weapon trials on a fully instrumented range with comprehensive customer support facilities. Trials can include both development and in-service activities in the fields of bombing, short range surface-to-air and air-to-surface missile firings, laser gun firings, weapon system designator, and explosive trials. There has been only one unplanned explosion at West Freugh in the last two years, that of 19 October 1995, in which two DERA personnel were injured.

Your third question asked about an inquiry into the incident of 19 October. The Managing Director of DTEO has set up a formal Committee of Inquiry specifically to investigate the incident. This is currently gathering the detailed evidence to establish what happened and is making recommendations accordingly. We are also in touch with the Health and Safety Executive.

Attack Helicopter

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the (a) current total estimated cost and in service date and (b) original total estimated cost and in service date of the Army's attack helicopter. [458]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The current total estimated cost of the attack helicopter programme is £2.5 billion and, at the same price base, is about £120 million more than the estimated total programme cost when the competitive tendering and assessment phase was approved in 1991. The preferred in service date at that time was December 1997 but the later date of December 1998 was included in the invitation to tender. Following the conclusion of the competition, the in service date is currently estimated as 2000. This remains subject to confirmation in the continuing contract negotiations.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the progress made on the development of the Army's attack helicopter. [445]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I receive regular updates on the progress of major programmes such as the attack helicopter. Following the selection of the WAH64 aircraft to meet the Army's requirement for an attack helicopter, contractual negotiations are continuing with Westland Helicopters Ltd. Development of the McDonnell Douglas AH64D Longbow Apache for the US Army, on which the United Kingdom's aircraft will be based, has been completed and the production phase has been approved.

Departmental Running Costs

Mr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage saving of total running costs his Department expects to save in the next two financial years. [457]

Mr. Soames: The MOD's operating costs plans are set out in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1995", table 13, page 137.

F22 Aircraft

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions his Department has had with representatives from Lockheed Martin concerning the purchase of F22 aircraft. [464]

Mr. Arbuthnot: None.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration he has given to the purchase of American F22 aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [466]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We are not considering the purchase of American F22 aircraft.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the reports received from (a) his Departmental staff or (b) his independent advisers concerning the purchase leasing of F22 aircraft from America. [465]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My right hon. Friend has received no such reports.

Low Flying

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of complaints received from the borders region about tactical low flying sorties over the area over the past five years. [443]

Mr. Soames: The numbers of complaints and inquiries about military low flying received by my Department over the past five years from low flying areas 16 and 20T, which cover the borders area, are as follows:

1992: 486
1993: 583
1994: 599
'1995: 774

'Up to 31 October 1995.

European Court of Justice

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is his Department's policy to obey European Court judgments. [456]

Mr. Soames: The United Kingdom courts would give effect to the judgments of the European Court of Justice or the court of first instance as necessary and my Department would, of course, obey them.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Employment Disputes

Mr. Butler: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has for taking forward the proposals contained in the Green Paper "Resolving Employment Rights Disputes: Options for Reform" [1275]

Mr. Lang: A large number of responses to the Green Paper was received and the Government have given careful consideration to all views submitted. Most of the Green Paper proposals were widely supported and accordingly the Government have decided to implement them.

The Government continue to believe that employment disputes should, where possible, be resolved in-house through employers' own procedures. However, they recognise the reservations expressed by many responding to the Green Paper that the proposal to require employees to attempt to resolve disputes with their employers before being able to make an application to an industrial tribunal might lead to increased delays and complexity in tribunal procedures, rather than alleviating them. The Government have decided not to take forward this proposal.

The Government also recognise the concerns voiced about the proposals to require chairmen to sit alone, without lay members, in certain cases and have decided not to introduce any such statutory requirement. However, the Government are minded to extend the existing discretion for chairmen to sit alone where they consider this appropriate for certain technical cases, such as the determination of entitlement to redundancy payments.

The Government believe that the remaining proposals will, when implemented, make a significant contribution to easing the burdens facing the industrial tribunals. Some of the proposals will be modified in the light of responses to the Green Paper, and where necessary further informal consultation will be carried out with interested parties. Detailed proposals will be brought forward when a suitable legislative opportunity arises.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has undertaken a separate review and is considering the implications of the responses for that jurisdiction.

Patents (Genetic Research)

Ms Lynne: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consideration he has given to the establishment of limits to the patentability of life; what plans he has to exclude human, animal and plant tissue from patentability; and if he will make a statement. [621]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Patents are granted only for inventions which meet the statutory requirements of novelty, inventive step and industrial applicability. A patent would not be granted for any invention, the publication or exploitation of which would generally be expected to encourage offensive, immoral or anti-social behaviour. Apart from the exclusion of plant and animal varieties from patentability, inventions involving human, animal or plant material have to satisfy the same criteria as other inventions. The Government agree with the view of the House of Commons Science and Technology Committee in its recent report on human genetics that there is a role for patenting in the application of the results of genetic research. We have no plans to change the law in this respect.

Ministerial Travel, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how many times in the last year he has used the London underground while on official business; [361]

(2) how many times in the last year he has used London Transport buses while on official business. [576]

Mr. Lang: None.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [26]

Mr. Freeman: No Acts of Parliament or consolidated Acts that affect local government have been introduced by my Department since January 1994.

TREASURY

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 25 September ref. 0595/43 concerning a constituent. [219]

Mr. Jack: I am considering the hon. Member's letter and hope to reply soon.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Courts (Congestion)

33. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what measures he proposes to alleviate congestion in the courts. [519]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Court sittings in the Crown and county courts are being maintained at a level above that required to deal with incoming work. For example the Crown Court plans to sit 90,000 days this year, the highest on record. As a result, the number of outstanding cases is the lowest in over five years.

Legal Aid

34. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has received about the grant of legal aid to the seemingly wealthy. [520]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There were 50 responses to the consultation exercise held earlier this year on the grants of legal aid to the apparently wealthy. Since that time there have been 14 inquiries on this issue from Members of Parliament or the public.

35. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what new proposals he has to improve the legal aid system. [521]

Mr. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor published a Green Paper on the future of legal aid in May. Over 180 responses have been received. These are being analysed. A series of meetings are being arranged with some of the major respondents to allow them to expand on their views. The Lord Chancellor intends to make an announcement on the outcome of the consultation process in the new year.

36. Mr. Steen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement as to the level of the legal aid budget in each of the last three years. [522]

Mr. Taylor: Net expenditure on legal aid in each of the last three years was as follows, £1.1 billion, £1.2 billion and £1.3 billion. This represents an increase in expenditure of 19 per cent. over the three-year period.

During the same period the number of people helped rose from 3.3 million to 3.5 million, an increase of 6 per cent.

Civil Justice Review

37. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what improvements are planned following the civil justice review. [523]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor has welcomed the improvements recommended in Lord Woolf's review of civil justice and implementation of some has already begun. He recently announced his decision to increase the small claims arbitration limit from £1,000 to £3,000.

Trials (Press Coverage)

Mr. Soley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what consideration he has given to press coverage of trials. [512]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The administration of justice should, so far as possible, be public. Subject to certain statutory safeguards, including the law relating to contempt of court, the coverage of trials is a matter for the press itself.

House Conveyances

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many house conveyances were registered by the Land Registry offices in each of the past five years. [518]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Statistics relating to house conveyances are not separately maintained by the Land Registry. During the five years in question, transfers of all property, including house conveyances, registered by the Land Registry have remained consistent within the range of 1.4 to 1.6 million. Currently, approximately 88 per cent. of transfers relate to residential property.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Pledging Conference

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what pledges the Government re-affirmed on spending for least developed countries at the UN's intergovernmental meeting; and if he will make a statement. [220]

Mr. Hanley: The UN pledging conference for operational activities for development took place in New York on 1 and 2 November. In common with many other donor countries, the United Kingdom made no pledges.

Aid Statistics

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of GNP the United Kingdom has spent in aid to the least developed countries in the last three years for which figures are available; and if he will list the countries. [223]

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

PROPORTION OF UNITED KINGDOM GNP SPENT IN OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE TO LEAST DEVELOPED COUNTRIES (LLDCs)

1993: 0.08

The countries defined as least developed in the period covered were:

Afghanistan
Bangladesh
Benin
Bhutan
Botswana
Burkina Faso
Burma
Burundi
Cambodia
Cape Verde Islands
Central African Republic
Chad
Comoros
Djibouti
Equatorial Guinea
Ethiopia
Gambia
Guinea
Guinea-Bissau
Haiti
Kiribati
Laos
Lesotho
Liberia
Madagascar
Malawi
Maldive Republic
Mali

Primary Education

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to increase his Department's expenditure on primary education programmes. [221]

Mr. Hanley: Individual country aid strategies are agreed with the countries concerned, in accordance with their needs and priorities for United Kingdom assistance. The ODA's policy for support to education, formulated in 1994, lays emphasis on the provision of basic education, which includes primary education.

In the last year, major new projects to support primary education have been agreed with: Malawi, £7.3 million; Pakistan, £7.9 million; and India, £46 million.

Plans are currently being developed for further project support at the primary level in a number of countries. It is not possible to give exact levels of expenditure on primary education prior to their finalisation.

PRIME MINISTER

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what consideration he is giving to the recent findings of the Select Committee on Defence in regard to Gulf war syndrome; what action he is taking and if he will make a statement. [110]

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will be considering the points made by the House of Commons Defence Committee very carefully and will reply formally in due course.

French Nuclear Tests

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what percentage of representations he has received on the French nuclear tests have supported the views of the Prime Minister and President Chirac. [349]

The Prime Minister: I have received a substantial number of representations expressing a range of views.

Stonehenge

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Prime Minister who is responsible for co-ordinating Government policy concerning the future of the Stonehenge site. [376]

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage.

Nigeria

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a full statement of the conclusions reached at the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference regarding the situation of the Ogoni people and the death sentence on Mr. Saro-Wiwa. [985]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) on 16 November, Official Report, columns 6–7.

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [47]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes my Office is part of the Cabinet Office (Office of Public Service). I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [375]

The Prime Minister: I am not usually able to undertake such journeys.

Duke of Windsor

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister what public records are held in respect of communications held between his predecessor and Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, about the marriage of the late Duke of Windsor; and if he will make a statement. [288]

The Prime Minister: Communications that concern the marriage of the late Duke of Windsor took place between the then Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, and Mr. Mackenzie King in late 1936. Like all papers relating to the abdication, these are currently closed until 2037 by agreement between the then Prime Minister and Lord Chancellor in 1976. However, as with the generality of papers held for more than 30 years, these papers will be reviewed and, while it is expected that many will continue to to be sensitive for some time to come, it is not ruled out that it may be possible to release them earlier than 2037.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what consideration led to the decision not to release to the Public Record Office certain papers relating to the conduct of the Duke of Windsor during the second world war, as indicated in his answer of 3 November, Official Report, column 478; [342]

(2) if copies of all communications this century between heads of state of other countries and the United Kingdom monarch are (a) lodged in the Public Record Office or (b) lodged exclusively in the royal archives; and whether all such documents are available for public inspection regardless of where they are lodged. [904]

The Prime Minister: Documents held by Government Departments are released to the Public Record Office after 30 years in accordance with the Public Records Acts 1958 and 1967, unless they meet criteria which allow them, with the Lord Chancellor's approval, to be withheld for longer. These criteria, which apply equally to records relating to the royal family, were recently revised and are set out in the White Paper on open government, Command Paper 2290 published in July 1993. Records withheld for longer than 30 years under the earlier criteria are being re-reviewed in the light of the revised criteria.

Copies of communications belonging to the sovereign are lodged in the royal archives and access is a matter for the Keeper of the Royal Archives.

Royal Family

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister to what extent his duty to act as the principal adviser to the Queen extends also to the Prince and Princess of Wales. [434]

The Prime Minister: Ministers may on occasions provide advice to other members of the royal family.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister what communications or discussions he has had in the past year with Prime Ministers of those countries where Her Majesty the Queen is also head of state about matters relating to the monarchy. [431]

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will make it his policy to introduce legislation further amending the Regency Act 1937; [433]

(2) if he will make it his policy to introduce legislation to amend the Royal Marriages Act 1772; [432]

(3) if he will make it his policy to introduce legislation to permit (a) the monarch and (b) heirs to the throne, to contract a morganatic marriage. [287]

The Prime Minister: No.

SCOTLAND

Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to extend the provision of closed circuit television to communities in Scotland on a similar basis as the scheme presently operated in England; and if local authorities will be limited to asking for closed circuit television in respect of city or town centre locations. [341]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend announced last month that funding will be made available, starting in 1996–97, to extend the use of closed circuit television in Scottish communities. Details of the scheme will be announced later this year.

Trunk Road Programme

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give a starting date for work on (a) the A96 Kintore bypass and (b) the Keith, Blackburn and Tipperty bypasses. [340]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend will make clear his plans for the trunk road programme as soon as possible after the conclusions of this year's public expenditure survey.

HEALTH

NHS Supplies Authority

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the report of the National Audit Office into the NHS supplies authority to be published. [203]

Mr. Sackville: Publication of this report is a matter for the Comptroller and Auditor-General.

Cervical Smear Tests

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the Berkshire family health services authority with respect to the provision of NHS and private cervical smear tests by the Boundary House GP practice in Bracknell, Berkshire; what is his Department's policy on GPs advocating private cervical smear tests which can be provided more frequently than NHS cervical smear tests; and if he will make a statement. [93]

Mr. Sackville: None. Guidelines issued by the Department of Health say that women aged between 20 and 64 years should be invited for cervical screening at least every five years. Berkshire health commission is complying fully with these guidelines by ensuring the Boundary House GP practice provides cervical screening on a five-yearly basis. Where women request more frequent screening, GPs will provide information on where this is available.

Dental Services

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to make a statement on the progress of his talks with representatives of the dental profession to discuss the proposals announced in the Government's statement on NHS dentistry of 5 April, Official Report columns 1214–15, and when he will implement them; [94]

(2) if he will estimate the cost of relating payments given to dentists to disease levels in children most in need as announced in the Government's statement on NHS dentistry on 5 April; and how he is planning to meet this expected expenditure; [95]

(3) if he expects to maintain the current levels of gross payment to dentists working in the NHS; and if he will make a statement; [96]

(4) if he will estimate the selected costs and potential savings from the introduction of more rigorous prior approval procedures as announced in the Government's statement of NHS dentistry of 5 April; [97]

(5) if he will estimate the number of patients who will be deregistered as a result of the proposals announced in the Government's statement of NHS dentistry of 5 April; [98]

(6) if he plans to produce criteria to evaluate the effectiveness of any proposals announced in the Government's statement of NHS dentistry of 5 April that are implemented. [100]

Mr. Malone: The reform proposals I announced to the House on 5 April 1995 fall into two parts. For the longer term, the Government intend to introduce a system of local contracts between health authorities and dental practices. This requires primary legislation and would need to be carefully piloted and evaluated.

For the medium term, the Government put forward measures to reform the current system. Discussions with the General Dental Services Committee on the detailed development of these proposals are making progress. We hope to move to implementation of the measures from 1 April 1996.

The issue of relating payments to disease levels is one of those currently under discussion with the profession, as are the proposals for more rigorous prior approval. We would seek to minimise any additional administration costs arising from greater rigour. There is no reason why patients should be deregistered as a consequence of the reforms which are intended to create a secure and stable future for NHS dentistry. The proposals should lead to an increase in the number of children registered.

The level of gross payments to dentists working in the NHS is determined by a number of factors, including the annual recommendation of the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body.

The measures we hope to introduce in April are developments of the existing remuneration system for dentists rather than a new untried system. Nevertheless, we intend to keep their impact under close review.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with members of the dental profession concerning the development of the Community Dental Service as announced in the Government's statement on NHS dentistry of 5 April. [99]

Mr. Malone: We are currently discussing this issue with, among others, the joint negotiating forum for community dentistry at the British Dental Association.

Leukaemia

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plan he has to hold an investigation into the incidence of leukaemia amongst children in the Pembroke road area of Northampton; and if he has consulted the Northamptonshire health authority about this; [101]

(2) what representations he has received from medical professionals and members of the public with regard to the incidence of leukaemia amongst children in the Pembroke road area of Northampton; [102]

(3) what estimate he can give of the comparative incidence of leukaemia amongst children nationally and in the Pembroke road area of Northampton. [103]

Mr. Sackville: I understand that Northamptonshire health authority has been investigating the situation and expects to publish a progress report shortly. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Simon Schanschieff, chairman of the authority, for details.

Administration Costs

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for (i) 1985, (ii) 1986, (iii) 1987 and (iv) 1988 expenditure on administration by health authorities. [104]

Mr. Malone: The expenditure on headquarters administration by health authorities in England for 1984–85, 1985–86, 1986–87 and 1987–88 is shown in the table.

£ thousands

	Expenditure
1984–85	416,173
1985–86	402,126
1986–87	434,739
1987–88	492,776

Note:
The figures represent the total revenue expenditure on pay and accommodation cost of staff of all disciplines and their support staff employed at headquarters levels. These figures are not comparable with those for later years as there have been changes in the roles and responsibilities of health authorities, together with changes in accounting policies.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each year since 1985 Department's expenditure on administration costs. [105]

Mr. Sackville: Details of the Department's administration costs are provided in the Department's annual reports for 1992–93 to 1994–95, Cm 1913, 1993–94 to 1995–96, Cm 2212, and 1995–96 to 1997–98, Cm 2812 copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for the years 1986–87 to 1988–89 are an estimated apportionment to the Department of Health prior to the split of the DHSS in 1990–91. Department of Health administration costs are not available prior to 1986–87.

Employment of Children

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on the protection of child workers. [608]

Mr. Bowis: We have a comprehensive legal system in place to protect the health, welfare and education of children who work. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member of Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on 30 October, Official Report, columns 42-43 detailing my recently announced proposals for some minor improvements to that system.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of children working over 10 hours per week; and if he will make a statement. [609]

Mr. Bowis: Such information as is available centrally was published in the April 1995 edition of the Employment Gazette, copies of which are available in the Library.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Liable Relatives

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the number of claims for income support by liable relatives that ceased within four weeks of Department of Social Security action; and what were the annual benefit savings produced in (a) historic and (b) current prices as a result of these actions in each year since 1989. [624]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested.

Income Support

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the number of income support claimants with deductions from benefit and (b) the average amount of deduction for each category of deduction for (i) 1988 and (ii) the latest date available adopting the figures contained in his Department's annual statistical inquiry. [622]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is set out in the tables.

Deduction[2]	Number of claimants[3]	Average amount £
DEDUCTIONS FROM INCOME SUPPORT: 1988[1]
Electricity	152,000	9.22

Child Support

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what facilities there are for newly separated couples to draw up an amicable and binding child maintenance agreement without the involvement of the Child Support Agency in cases where neither party is a recipient of income support, family credit or disability working allowance. [625]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: All such couples are free to do so.

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the level of child support would be in 1995 if it had been uprated in line with prices since 1965. [1058]

Mr. Mitchell: The information is in the table.

	First child £	Second child £	Third child £
Under age 11	9.16	11.98	12.58
Aged 11-15	11.17	13.89	14.60
Aged 16 and over	13.19	15.91	16.61

1. The amounts quoted are those which would have been payable from April 1995. 2. The table shows the combined value of child tax allowance and family allowance and assumes payment of tax at the standard rate.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent examinations of child support systems within the United States of America. [620]

Mr. Mitchell: This is a matter for the United States' federal and state Governments.

Child Support Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many employees of the Child Support Agency have (a) been dismissed and (b) faced other disciplinary action from each office of the Child Support Agency indicating the month and year that such action was taken for (i) the improper use of confidential information and (ii) other improper behaviour. [623]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Child Benefit

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what total gross and net savings in 1995–96 resulted from not uprating child benefit in line with prices since 1979. [444]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: If child benefit had been uprated annually in line with the retail prices index and with the normal rounding to the nearest 5p, the April 1979 rate—£4.00 per week per child—would be £10.85 from April 1995. It is estimated that the total savings in 1995–96 from paying £10.40 for the eldest qualifying child and £8.45 for each other child, instead of £10.85 for every child, are about £900 million. The corresponding net savings, after allowing for normal adjustments to other benefits are around £650 million.

Extra help has been made available to less well-off families since 1988 through the income-related benefits. This will be worth around £1.2 billion in 1995–96. The overall expenditure on families has increased by 121 per cent. in real terms between 1978–79 and 1995–96.

TRANSPORT

Search and Rescue Helicopters

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what new assessment he has made of the safety implications of the changes made in the past year in the helicopter search and rescue service. [355]

Mr. Norris: The only change in search and rescue helicopter provision in the past year has been the withdrawal of the Royal Navy helicopter at Portland and its replacement, on a temporary basis, by a coastguard helicopter. This has no adverse implications for safety. At the same time, we have established an inter-departmental helicopter review group to examine the national requirement for helicopters for search and rescue, and how this might most effectively and efficiently be met, as part of an integrated approach to search and rescue. The group is due to report to Ministers in the new year.

Drowning Incident

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport following the drowning of Pamela Drew on Sunday 5 November at Musselwick, Marloes, Pembrokeshire, if he will list the times (a) the coastguard was informed of the emergency, (b) Littlehaven lifeboat was informed, (c) Chivenor SAR helicopter was informed, (d) Littlehaven lifeboat was launched, (e) Chivenor SAR helicopter took off, (f) Littlehaven lifeboat spotted casualties, (g) Littlehaven lifeboat got casualties on board,

(h) of the arrival of Chivenor SAR helicopter over lifeboat, (i) casualties were winched on board the helicopter and (j) of the arrival of casualties at Withybush hospital, Haverfordwest. [905]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 20 November 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the drowning of Pamela Drew on Sunday 5 November at Musselwick, Marloes, Pembrokeshire.

The times given are in Universal Co-ordinated Time (UTC)

(b) 1656

(c) 1656

(d) 1702

(e) 1703

(f) not recorded

(g) 1724

(h) 1733

(i) 1738

(j) 1745

Abnormal Loads

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what financial arrangements are made when abnormal loads are moved on motorways. [343]

Mr. Watts: The suitability of any route for the movement of an abnormal load has to be notified and cleared by the highways authorities and police forces involved. The vehicle operator or his employer is required to meet the cost of any surveys of structures involved, any strengthening required, and in some cases, for the provision of police escorts.

Bull Bars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the danger of bull bars from (a) coroners, (b) industry, (c) road safety organisations and (d) the public. [353]

Mr. Norris: The number of representation the Department has received over the past two years is as follows:

	Coroners	Industry	Road safety organisations	Public
1994	0	0	0	64
1995	0	19	5	364

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the Acts of Parliament including consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [36]

Mr. Norris: Schedule 6 to the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill, which was introduced by my right hon. Friend's predecessor on 23 November 1994, modifies the functions of planning authorities in relation to development authorised by part I of the Bill.

Consolidation Bills are a responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friends the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [414]

Sir George Young: I travel on London Transport buses and on the London Underground both as a constituency MP and in a personal capacity. For short journeys in London, I often walk.

East London Line (Correspondence)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will answer the letters from the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford, of 18 October, 26 October, 30 October and 9 November concerning the closure of the East London Line. [200]

Mr. Norris: I replied to the letters of 18 October, 26 October and 30 October on 13 November. A reply to the hon. Member's letter of 9 November will follow shortly.

Ministerial Travel (British Rail)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times in the last year he has used British Rail while on official business. [420]

Sir George Young: I travel regularly to work by British Rail and I have used British Rail in the course of nine official visits since July this year.

Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Act

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reasons the Road Traffic (Driving Instruction by Disabled Persons) Act 1993 has not fully been brought into force; and when he intends to do so. [199]

Mr. Norris: It has not been possible to bring this Act into force because the implementing regulations and related amendments to other regulations have proved more complex than was expected. I am pleased to be able to say that the difficulties have been resolved and we now intend to make the regulations to enable the Act to come into force in the first half of next year.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Set Aside

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to ensure that set-aside land contributes a greater benefit to the environment. [351]

Mr. Baldry: Proposals have recently been agreed that allow land removed from production under agri-environmental and forestry schemes to count against set-aside requirements; this will allow longer term environmental gains.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Union Fisheries Council, held on 15 November listing all votes, and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [436]

Mr. Baldry: The Fisheries Council which was to have been held on 15 November was cancelled, following successful negotiations at official level on fish guide prices for 1996.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Union Agriculture Council, held on 13 to 14 November listing all votes, and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [437]

Mr. Baldry: The Agriculture Council meeting scheduled for 13 and 14 November did not take place. It has been re-scheduled for 29 and 30 November. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will report to the House on its outcome in the usual way.

Common Agriculture Policy

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to recoup moneys lost in fraud and mismanagement of the CAP in Britain. [350]

Mr. Baldry: EC finance regulations place an obligation on all member states to recover sums of money lost as a result of irregularities or negligence. The Government take their responsibilities very seriously and every effort is made to effect recovery from CAP beneficiaries where it is established that they are in receipt of money to which they were not entitled.

WALES

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency concerning the revenue shortfall in the land and buildings assets sales programme agreed with the agency; and if he will recalculate the grant-in-aid level to take account of the shortfall in (a) the remainder of this financial year and (b) 1996–97; [1053]

(2) if he will make a statement on the Welsh Development Agency's announcement of a suspension of all expenditure other than direct inward investment programmes for the remainder of the financial year. [1052]

Mr. Hague: I regularly meet the chairman of the Welsh Development Agency to discuss a wide range of issues.

The agency has decided to adjust its programmes in line with its priorities to take account of the lower than anticipated level of receipts this financial year.

Grant-in-aid to the agency for 1995–96 was determined last year along with my Department's commitments to other Welsh programmes. I will be announcing the position on all Welsh programmes for 1996–97 in December.

Fish Passes

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Wales region of the National Rivers Authority in relation to the provision of effective fish passes for migratory salmonid and other fish on the weirs on the lower reaches of the River Taff. [1051]

Mr. Hague: None. Fish passes at Radyr weir, Blackweir and the design for the Cardiff barrage fish pass have each received my Department's approval.

South East Wales Ambulance Trust

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what consultations he has had with the chairman of the South East Wales ambulance trust concerning incidents in which Mercedes-Benz Wadham Stringer ambulances have rolled over at low speeds and the removal of all such vehicles in the trust fleet from road duty since 8 November pending a determination of the mechanical explanation for the incidents; [1055]

(2) if he will set up an inquiry into the Mercedes-Benz Wadham Stringer ambulance models used by the South East Wales ambulance trust for the past 18 months and removed from the road since the night of Wednesday, 8 November and if he will make a statement. [1054]

Mr. Hague: This is an operational matter for the trust which has already taken action to ensure the safety of the ambulance fleet.

Emergency Admissions

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he proposes to ensure that there are no further closures of emergency admissions to hospitals in West Glamorgan; on how many occasions emergency admissions have been closed since July; how many patients have been refused admission; and if he will make a statement. [218]

Mr. Richards: Hospitals in West Glamorgan have closed to medical emergencies on 44 occasions since the beginning of July. However, no patient has been refused treatment.

This is a matter between the West Glamorgan health authority and local trusts. This issue will be discussed between NHS representatives and the Department shortly when it is hoped that an agreement can be reached on an approach to minimise the risk to patient services both over the coming winter and in the longer term.

Students' Living Standards

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will call for a report to be conducted on the living standards of undergraduate students in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [616]

Mr. Hague: No. The Department for Education and Employment has recently commissioned a survey of student income and expenditure to take place in the current academic year. The survey will be based on a representative sample of full-time home students on higher education courses below postgraduate level at publicly funded institutions in the United Kingdom. The report of the survey's findings will be published in due course.

Inward Investment Shares

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of jobs created by inward investment in the United Kingdom in each of the past three years are now located in Wales. [345]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The forecast job creation in Wales as a percentage of the United Kingdom total from inward investment by overseas owned companies in the past three years continues to be greater than our proportion of the United Kingdom population at about 13 per cent. in 1992–93, and almost 13 per cent. in 1993–94. In 1994–95 the figure was 8 per cent. These percentages are based upon information provided by companies at the time of the decision to invest and take no account of any subsequent decisions.

St. David's Day

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received to make St. David's day a bank holiday in Wales, and what response he has made to them. [354]

Mr. Hague: I have received a number of representations on this matter. In each case I have advised that Government have no plans to designate St. David's day a public holiday in Wales.

Roadside Signs

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to allow rural holiday businesses to display small roadside advertising boards where it is safe and useful for the business's economic viability; and if he will make a statement. [617]

Mr. Hague: My Department has circulated proposals for extending the range of businesses eligible to apply for white on brown directional signs to include all establishments which are considered likely to be used by tourists. We are considering comments received and hope to make an announcement soon.

Civil Service Jobs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new proposals he has to increase and safeguard the number of civil service jobs in Wales. [352]

Mr. Hague: The number of civil service jobs in Wales, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, will be those required for the effective and efficient implementation of Government policies and services.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Nursery Voucher Scheme

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what mechanism she proposes to claw back standard spending assessment from local authorities to fund the nursery voucher scheme. [1057]

Mr. Robin Squire: The SSA deduction mechanism proposed is cash neutral for all authorities, provided that the schools that they maintain continue to recruit four-year-olds at present levels.

The sum deducted in 1997–98 will be the product of the voucher value and the number of four-year-olds in maintained provision in 1995–96, taking into account termly variations in attendance. This is only part of total LEA expenditure on under-fives; authorities can continue to spend above the voucher value on full or part-time places for four-year-olds, and on three-year-olds, as they judge appropriate.

The views of local government as a whole will be taken into account in the usual way in determining changes to funding methodology in 1997–98.

Drug Education

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made as to which projects on illegal drug education in Britain have resulted in a decrease in drug use. [347]

Mr. Robin Squire: The 16 innovative drug education and prevention projects supported under the Department's grants for education support and training programme in 1995–96 will be independently evaluated. In addition, the Office for Standards in Education is undertaking a specific study of provision for drug education in schools during this academic year. This will take account of existing research findings on effective drug education and will establish evidence on best practice.

Education Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the voting record of each member state on items agreed at the meeting of the European Community's Education Council held on 23 October; and if she will make it her practice to include details of all votes, including where there have been no votes, in the future. [441]

Mr. Forth: No formal votes were taken at the 23 October Education Council. A record of votes taken at Education Councils is generally given in the Council secretariat press release. I shall arrange for a copy of the press release about the 23 October Council to be deposited in the Library. Press releases relating to future Councils will be deposited as soon as they are available.

School Sports Fields (Sales)

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the value of land sold by local authorities formerly used as school sports fields. [509]

Mrs. Gillan: The information requested is not held centrally.

ENVIRONMENT

Ministerial Transport

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times in the last year he has used the London underground while on official business. [574]

Mr. Gummer: None.

Gritting Lorries

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of local authority gritting lorries; and if he will make a statement. [1040]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not held centrally.

Local Government (Legislation)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [40]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following Acts that affect local government have been introduced by the Department of the Environment since January 1994:

The Environment Act 1995

The Town and County Planning (Costs of Inquiries etc) Act 1995

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the Isle of Wight council has borrowed from his Department for the costs of setting up the unitary authority; what are the terms of these loans; and when they have to be repaid. [15]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department does not lend money to authorities. We have introduced a scheme that, through the issue of supplementary credit approvals, allows local authorities to borrow from normal sources—Public Works Loans Board, money markets, for example—to cover one-off transitional costs of local government reorganisation. To date, the Isle of Wight council has been informed that the Department is prepared to issue SCAs to the value of £1.74 million in respect of eligible costs under the transitional costs scheme. Records are not held centrally on the terms and conditions of loans taken out by local authorities.

Land Government Finance

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to report on the progress of the review of the calculation of the area cost adjustment in the standard spending assessment. [19]

Sir Paul Beresford: The local authority associations are co-operating with us in carrying out the review. We and they are identifying the team which will conduct the review. It is our intention to seek a report of the review by June 1996. This would allow discussion and consideration of any possible changes to our current methodology in time for the 1997–98 settlement.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to change the area cost adjustment element of standard spending assessments; and if he will make a statement. [106]

Mr. Curry: We have no plans to change the present methodology by which we calculate the area cost adjustment until we have a robust system to put in its place.

On 16 October, I proposed to the local authority associations an independent review of the adjustment. The aim is to establish a method of carrying out the adjustment which commands the widest degree of acceptance among authorities in all parts of the country, has a sound conceptual basis and is practical to apply.

The review will be steered by a leading academic together with someone knowledgeable about local government finance, nominated by the local authority associations, and someone familiar with central Government processes, nominated by the Secretary of State. I hope we shall soon be able to announce who those people will be.

Research will be commissioned to assist the review in its work. We shall seek a report from the review in June 1996.

Local Authority Homes (Sales)

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total number of local authority homes now sold in the United Kingdom, giving the total amount of money raised since 1983; and if he will make a statement. [453]

Mr. Clappison: In England, about 1.1 million local authority homes were sold for owner-occupation between January 1983 and June 1995. The money raised from those sales, after lending for council house purchase, is estimate to be over £16 billion.

In addition, there were more than 200,000 local authority sales to housing associations and other types of ownership in the same period. Information on the value of these sales before October 1988 is not available, but the net receipts of the 188,000 sales after this date is some £1.6 billion.

For information on sales elsewhere in the United Kingdom, I refer the hon. Member to the Secretaries of State for Wales, for Scotland and for Northern Ireland.

Tenancies (Legislation)

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has received concerning his proposals to amend legislation following the consultation in 1994 on access to local authority and housing association tenancies. [357]

Mr. Curry: There has been a steady flow of correspondence about different aspects of the policy since we announced in July 1994 our decision to proceed with legislation.

Unfit Properties

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate for each county in the United Kingdom the number of unfit properties, together with the distribution of these properties by tenure; and if he will make a statement. [455]

Mr. Clappison: Local authorities in England are requested to provide information on dwellings in their area which are unfit—that is, fail to meet all the fitness criteria in section 83 of schedule 9 to the 1989 Local Government and Housing Act—in their annual housing investment programme returns. Separate figures are requested for local authority, housing association, other public sector and private sector dwellings. The figures provided are local authorities' own estimates and are not necessarily compiled on a consistent basis.

The reported estimates for 1 April 1994, the latest date for which figures are available, are given in the 1994 "HIP1 All Items Print", a copy of which is in the Library. The print includes county totals where estimates have been provided by all the authorities in the county.

For information for the rest of the United Kingdom I would refer the hon. Member to the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Homelessness

Mrs. Maddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the number of people who were accepted as statutorily homeless in the United Kingdom over the last 16 years by (a) sex, (b) age group and (c) ethnic group; and if he will make a statement. [451]

Mr. Clappison: The information requested is not available.

Refuse (Transport and Disposal)

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legal prohibitions relate to the transport and disposal of refuse from the Isle of Man to the United Kingdom. [1056]

Mr. Clappison: In May 1994, the United Kingdom became a party to the Basel convention on the control of transboundary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal. The Isle of Man is not yet a party to the convention. Shipments of waste between parties and non-parties to the convention are prohibited, except where covered by a bilateral, multilateral or regional agreement or arrangement complying with article 11 of the convention.

Imports of waste from the Isle of Man into the United Kingdom for disposal are therefore currently prohibited. The British Government and the Government of the Isle of Man are in the process of concluding a bilateral agreement, under article 11 of the convention, which would allow imports into the United Kingdom of specific hazardous wastes for which the Isle of Man lacks suitable disposal facilities.

Waste may also be transported for recovery purposes. The OECD decision concerning the control of transfrontier movements of wastes destined for recovery operations constitutes a multilateral agreement for the purpose of article 11 of the Basel convention. Both the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man are covered by the OECD decision. Shipments of waste for recovery between the Isle of Man and the United Kingdom are therefore allowed, subject to the relevant control regime prescribed in the OECD decision.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to ensure that persons from abroad who are registered with the Home Department as asylum seekers, and who have no entitlement to benefits, will not have access to publicly-funded housing assistance. [1536]

Mr. Curry: Under the Government's proposals for fairer access to local authority and housing association tenancies, persons from abroad who have no entitlement to benefits will be eligible neither for assistance under the homelessness legislation nor to register on a local housing authority waiting list. This includes people who have sought asylum after entry to United Kingdom, and those whose applications for asylum have been refused by the Home Secretary. We intend to bring forward legislation to implement our proposals in the new parliamentary Session.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Lottery

13. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received about regional disparities in the allocation of funds arising from the national lottery. [494]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The national lottery has captured the imagination of the country. I have received some letters from people who want to help ensure widespread distribution of lottery funding. We are committed to ensuring that the whole country benefits from the great success of the lottery.

15. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has to ensure a more equitable distribution of national lottery money throughout the United Kingdom. [496]

Mrs. Bottomley: Every region in the United Kingdom has benefited. Over 3,000 awards have been made from the lottery in the first eight months of distribution.

The geographical spread of awards will be kept under review. There should not be envy of the major awards in the hon. Lady's constituency.

18. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will review the arrangements for the national lottery. [499]

Mrs. Bottomley: The national lottery is working extremely well; the number of people playing and the money being raised for the good causes has exceeded everybody's expectations.

The lottery will be kept under review. I recently announced the millennium award scheme which will allow us to invest in people's talent to provide a spring board for the nation's success in the next millennium.

20. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much revenue the national lottery has generated for good causes. [503]

Mrs. Bottomley: Over £1.2 billion has been raised for the five good causes because the national lottery is successful. No other lottery in the world has raised so much so quickly.

21. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has for amending legislation to enable national lottery money to be used for other than capital purposes; and if she will make a statement. [504]

Mrs. Bottomley: National lottery funding is already available for other than capital purposes.

The National Charities Board makes revenue grants available to caring charities.

The millennium award scheme will invest in people's talent.

23. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of the benefits to poorer sections of the community of disbursements of proceeds from the national lottery. [506]

Mrs. Bottomley: National lottery proceeds in the areas of the five good causes are being distributed to thousands of projects that are benefiting many poorer sections of the community. They are helping to bring whole communities together, raise morale and enthusiasm and improve the quality and opportunity of people's lives. Capital spending generates jobs.

25. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement about the first year's operations of the national lottery. [510]

Mrs. Bottomley: The national lottery has been an outstanding success in its first year.

Thirty million people play and enjoy a harmless flutter every week with the result that over £1.2 billion of new money has been raised for the five good causes.

More than £720 million has been awarded to over 3,000 projects throughout the country so far. We are investing unprecedented sums in this country's sport and culture which will benefit people into the next millennium. It will provide a huge boost to regeneration, creating jobs and economic prosperity.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much money she estimates will be contributed to charities and good causes by the national lottery in a full year. [505]

Mrs. Bottomley: Between £1.4 billion and £1.6 billion will be available for the good causes, including caring charities, in the current financial year.

16. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many good causes have been awarded funds from the national lottery in Wales. [497]

Mrs. Bottomley: Two hundred and fifty national lottery awards, covering all five good causes, and totalling £26,701,388 have been awarded in Wales.

My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that the Millennium Commission has today made an award in Wales: £146,500 for the church community hall in Sully.

School Children (Arts)

14. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what measures are proposed to ensure that all school children are introduced to a major opera or ballet production during their school years. [495]

Mr. Sproat: All of the opera and ballet companies in receipt of public subsidy are developing extensive education programmes aimed specifically at opening up their work to children at school. As part of an initiative recently announced by my right hon. Friend, I am about to consult widely on ways in which the Government and others can help to make the arts even more accessible.

Opera Subsidies

17. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is his latest estimate of the subsidy paid out of public funds for each seat at opera performances in England. [498]

Mr. Sproat: The most recent available figures are for 1994–95, when the average subsidy per seat, for those opera companies funded by the Arts Council of England, was £25.57.

Government Art Collection

19. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will estimate the value of works of art added to the Government art collection in lieu of inheritance tax over the past five years. [501]

Mr. Sproat: The Government art collection has not been allocated any works of art accepted in lieu of inheritance tax over the past five years.

BBC Transmitters

24. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has for the privatisation of BBC transmitters. [507]

Mr. Sproat: We are considering the options for the future of the BBC's transmission services and will announce our decision shortly.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 21 November 1995

PRIME MINISTER

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all those in his Office who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1401]

The Prime Minister: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate departmental Minister. I have not myself, nor have others within my Office or the Cabinet Office, signed public interest certificates in the last five years.

French Nuclear Tests

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he received from the Governments of (a) Australia and (b) New Zealand prior to the French nuclear tests in the South Pacific regarding opposition to the tests; and if he will publish them. [1537]

The Prime Minister: We have had a number of contacts with the Australian and New Zealand Governments on this issue. These exchanges remain confidential between the Governments concerned.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 21 November 1995. [1480]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Opera Hats

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he has any plans to increase the number of opera hats available for hon. Members' use during points of order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I have no such plans, but my hon. Friend may wish to draw the matter to the attention of the Procedure Committee.

Early-day Motions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what plans he has to introduce a parliamentary procedure to enable the Comptroller and Auditor General to respond to early-day motions.

Mr. Newton: I have no such plans.

Short Money

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Lord President of the Council what public funds the Leader of the Opposition receives to run Opposition political affairs.

Mr. Newton: Under paragraph 1 of the resolution of the House of 4 November 1993, financial assistance, known as "Short Money", is available to assist Opposition parties in carrying out their parliamentary business. The maximum amount which is available to the official Opposition for the year beginning 1 April 1995 is £1,408,448.12.

Under paragraph 2 of the resolution, financial assistance is also available towards travelling and associated expenses necessarily incurred by an Opposition party's spokesmen in relation to the party's parliamentary business. The maximum amount which is available to the official Opposition for the year beginning 1 April 1995 is £18,301.

Campbell Soups

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee if he will seek to place a ban on the procurement of Campbell Soups products by the Refreshment Department of the House of Commons. [680]

Mr. Colin Shepherd: This is a matter for the director of the catering services. I have asked her to write to the hon. Member.

TREASURY

Grant-maintained Schools (Borrowing)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if borrowing by grant-maintained schools is to be included in the public sector borrowing requirement. [1484]

Mr. Waldegrave: Grant-maintained schools are not classified as public sector bodies in the Central Statistical Office's national accounts but as private non-profit-making bodies serving persons. Therefore borrowing by grant-maintained schools is not included in the public sector borrowing requirement.

Insurance Policies

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to be able to report on the results of the Inland Revenue's review of the taxation of insurance policies; and if he will make a statement. [90]

Mr. Jack: It would be inappropriate for me to comment on tax matters at this stage of the Budget cycle.

VAT

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount per week a married couple with two children on average male earnings is estimated to have paid in VAT, at today's prices, in the year 1978–79; and what he estimates a similar family will pay in (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1996–97. [86]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is estimated that the average amount of VAT paid by non-retired households with one or more children on average disposable income was £905 in 1979 and £1,495 in 1993, both at 1993 prices. Figures for future years will depend on the purchasing decisions of individuals.

EC Salary Payment Errors

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what material errors were detected in the EC Commission's payments of salaries in the EC's financial year 1994, irrespective of whether these errors were subsequently detected and corrected. [155]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: A number of errors were identified by the Court of Auditors in its recent annual report—Official Journal, 14 November 1995. These errors affected the movement along salary scales of locally employed staff of European Commission delegations. The Commission is taking action to deal with the problem.

Monetary Union

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the gap between Britain's situation and each of the convergence criteria of the Maastricht treaty (a) now, (b) by the end of 1996 and (c) by the end of 1997. [1100]

Mrs. Angela Knight: We fully expect to meet the convergence criteria by 1997.

Dairy Industry

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were employed in the dairy industry (a) on 31 October 1994 and (b) on the last date for which figures are available. [202]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The most reliable information on jobs in the dairy industry is available from the periodic censuses of employment. The census shows that there were 29,800 jobs in the dairy industry in Great Britain at September 1993. Estimates from the smaller labour force survey suggest a small increase between autumn 1994 and spring 1995.

Aviation Fuel

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rates of duty in pence per litre are charged on aviation gasoline and aviation kerosene in each of the 15 countries within the European Union; and how many litres of each fuel are consumed in the United Kingdom. [1499]

Mr. Heathcoat Amory: Aviation gasoline used by commercial and private aircraft is subject to excise duty at the rate of 18.07p per litre in the UK. No information is available about the rates of duty charged on aviation gasoline in other EU member states.

Aviation kerosene used by commercial aircraft is subject to the nil rate of excise duty in all the European Union member states. Aviation kerosene used by private aircraft is subject to a nil rate of duty in the UK; no information is available about the rates of duty charged in other EU member states on aviation kerosene used by private aircraft.

Some 39,179,000 litres of aviation gasoline and 9,257,964,000 litres of aviation kerosene were delivered for consumption in the UK in 1994.

Pensions

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action public service pension schemes have taken to ensure that where redress is due under the Securities and Investments Board's pensions review, employees can be reinstated at reasonable cost. [1655]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I am pleased to announce that, on advice from the Government Actuary, the Government have now agreed the charges for reinstating the pensions entitlement of current public service employees who opted out of a public service pension scheme as a result of mis-selling. These charges are paid to the schemes concerned by the individuals or firms responsible for mis-selling.

The charge for buying pension rights in respect of the period since the individual opted out of the public service scheme will be derived from the usual actuarially determined inward transfer value factors. These factors have recently been reviewed by the Government Actuary, and revised downwards.

Where, in addition, a transfer payment was made for earlier pensionable service, the charge for reinstating pension rights for that service will normally take the form of repayment, with appropriate interest, of the outward transfer value—the payment made by the public service pension scheme to the personal pension provider when the individual transferred to the personal pension scheme.

The Government Departments responsible for public service schemes are taking action to bring these changes into effect.

I welcome their action. It is an important step towards ensuring that those who have suffered loss as a result of mis-selling are restored to a financial position equivalent to what it would have been the case if mis-selling had not occurred. This is being done in a way that is fair to other scheme members, ensures that those responsible provide the right redress and is fair to the taxpayer.

I urge all occupational pension schemes in the private sector to follow the example of public service schemes by allowing current employees to rejoin for future service and also to buy back pension rights for previous service at reasonable cost.

Trustee Investments Act 1961

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at conclusions he has reached following consultation on the proposal to amend the Trustee Investments Act 1961 to increase the proportion of assets that all trusts are allowed to invest in wider range investments; and if he will make a statement. [1781]

Mrs. Angela Knight: In the short term, as proposed in the consultation document, the Treasury will make an order under section 13 of the Trustee Investments Act 1961 to change the split of wider and narrower range investments from 50:50 to 75:25, the maximum allowable under the Act as it now stands. This proportion was introduced for charities earlier this year by the Charities (Trustee Investments Act 1961) Order 1995.

In the longer term, the Government have concluded, in the light of representations from a wide range of interests, most recently the deregulation task force in its first annual report, that a fundamental deregulatory reform of the Trustee Investment Act is now called for. The requirements for division of assets into "narrow" and "broad" investments and for consequent dual accounting are burdensome. The Government will issue by 1 May 1996 a consultation document on options for further deregulatory change, drawing on detailed work to be undertaken by the Law Commission for England and Wales and the Scottish Law Commission in conjunction with the independent trust law committee.

EU Budget Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Union Budget Council, held on 17 November listing all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [435]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 20 November 1995]: I represented the United Kingdom at the Budget Council on 17 November. The Council considered the European Parliament's proposed changes to the draft budget, which the Council established in July—on which I reported in my reply to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) on 18 October 1995, Official Report, columns 278–80—and it established a Second Reading draft budget for 1996.

The Council's Second Reading draft budget totals 86,288 mecu, £72,578 million, in commitment appropriations and 81,603 mecu, £68,637 million, in payment appropriations. The Second Reading draft budget is 316 mecu, £266 million, in commitments and 589 mecu, £495 million, in payments below the financial perspective ceilings and is within the existing own resources ceiling of 1.20 per cent. The following table compares the outcome of the Budget Council with the proposals in the Commissions's preliminary draft budget and with the proposals in the European Parliament's draft budget, with reference to the financial perspective ceilings:

	Financial perspective expenditure ceilings		Preliminary draft budget[3]		Parliament draft budget		Council second reading draft budget
	mecu	£ million[1]	mecu	£ million	mecu	£ million	mecu	£ million

Notes:
[1] Throughout this reply the rate of £1=1.889 ecu has been used (the rate notified in the Official Journal as prevailing on the last working day of last month (31 October).
[2] As amended in Letter of Amendment No. 1 from the figure which appeared in the Commission's Overview of the PDB for 1996 to take account of the higher bid for agriculture under category 1.

The European Parliament will consider the draft budget for 1996 at its plenary session in December. The 1996 Community budget is expected to be adopted by the Parliament on 14 December, to take effect from 1 January 1996.

The Council took no formal votes, the presidency concluding that there was the necessary majority to establish the Second Reading draft budget for 1996.

ECOFIN

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the voting record of each member state on items agreed at the meeting of the European Community's ECOFIN Council held on 23 October; and if he will make it his practice to include details of all votes, including where there have been no votes, in the future. [440]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 20 November 1995]: There were no votes taken on items under discussion at the ECOFIN Council on 23 October.

In the future, as is my practice, after each ECOFIN Council I will report the result of votes and will indicate if no votes were taken.

TRANSPORT

Rail Freight

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from organisations seeking changes in the requirements for the award of freight facilities grants to enable intermodal schemes to qualify; and if he will make a statement. [534]

Mr. Watts: In principle intermodal schemes qualify for freight facilities grant.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the period of advance notice required for security reasons to be given by terminal operators for the packing of an intermodal unit to be transported from Britain to France (a) by rail and (b) by road and ferry. [536]

Mr. Watts: No notice is required for security reasons for rail freight being shipped by security approved freight forwarders. Railfreight Distribution, currently the only company carrying channel tunnel rail freight, require 20 hours' advance notification in respect of non-security-approved forwarders. There are no security related notice requirements in respect of road traffic travelling on the ferries or through the channel tunnel.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the annual budget allocated for the award of rail freight facilities grants and track access grants since 1992 and the number and value of the grants awarded. [535]

Mr. Watts: The annual budget for rail and inland waterway freight facilities grants is a joint one. In 1992–93, this was £6.571 million and in 1993–94 £3.265 million. From April 1994, the budget included the new track access grant and was £13.3 million for 1994–95. It is currently £14.4 million.

Since 1992, eight rail grants have been awarded with a total value of over £14 million. No track access grants have yet been awarded but several applications are currently under consideration.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the differences in security requirements imposed on the passage of rail freight using the channel tunnel and the Severn tunnel and what are the reasons for these differences; [539]

(2) what assessment he has made of the security risks posed by rail freight passing through (a) the channel tunnel and (b) the Severn tunnel. [546]

Mr. Watts: My Department regulates the security of the channel tunnel under the Channel Tunnel Security Order 1994. The measures imposed on operators are based on the security threat to the installation, as assessed by the Security Service, and the vulnerability of the system. It is not the practice to reveal details of security requirements.

My Department has no comparable responsibilities in relation to the Severn tunnel.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what response he has made to the representations of the railfreight users group regarding the consultation paper on the security aspects of rail groupage issued by his Department's security division; and if he will make a statement. [537]

Mr. Watts: I have responded to the correspondence that I have received from the Alliance for Channel Tunnel Freight, which incorporates the Rail Freight Group, acknowledging its concerns. I have asked officials to look carefully at the alliance's representations, and I understand a very constructive meeting took place between officials and the alliance on 15 November. Discussions are continuing.

Traffic Wardens

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many local authorities outside London have taken up his Department's offer to take on the responsibility for traffic wardens. [6]

Mr. Norris: We have invited local authorities to apply to take over parking enforcement, which would be decriminalised. Traffic wardens would be replaced by local authority parking attendants. So far, we have received one formal application—from Hampshire county council with regard to Winchester. We have received drafts of two other applications for comment and a number of expressions of interest.

Train Incidents (Reading)

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what incidents or accidents have occurred on both the South West Trains and Great Western railway lines in the vicinity of Reading station since July. [896]

Mr. Watts: The following accidents and incidents in the vicinity of Reading station have been reported to the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate since July 1995:

12 July 1995: Reading Depot
A driver sustained a strain to his leg whilst climbing out of his cab.

20 July 1995: Near Reading Station
A track circuit failure caused delay to services.

4 August 1995: Reading Station
A Royal Scotsman charter train was delayed at platform 8 for two hours after smoke was observed coming from a defective coach. A tyre on the coach had shifted due to brake drag.

15 August 1995: Near Reading Station
A track man was struck in the eye by a piece of wire protruding from a bush.

7 September 1995: Near Reading Station
Fourteen sets of points fused, which resulted in platforms 6 and 10 being out of use.

10 September 1995: Reading West Yard
An employee fell over discarded rail chairs, sustaining bruising.

4 October 1995: Reading Depot
An employee fractured his hand after trapping it in a gate.

Rolling Stock

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what levels of investment in new rolling stock the rolling stock companies agreed to undertake with his Department. [48]

Mr. Watts: All three passenger rolling stock leasing companies have confirmed to my right hon. Friend their readiness to invest on commercial terms in response to customers' requirements.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce the right of appeal for railway operators against private monopolies who increase the cost of rolling stock. [1614]

Mr. Watts: I do not recognise the circumstances described by the hon. Member.

Heathrow Airport (Rail Links)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further rail links his Department estimates will be built to Heathrow airport; and what assessment he has made of the impact that rail privatisation will have on (a) delaying or (b) expediting plans. [49]

Mr. Watts: The Heathrow Express rail link, a joint venture between BAA, British Rail and Railtrack, is under construction. Heathrow Express is due to start services in 1998 and will operate a service every quarter of an hour with a journey time from Paddington to Heathrow of 16 minutes.

Rail access to Heathrow airport is being considered within the London airports surface access study, which was set up in April by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State and is examining the opportunities for economically beneficial improvements in access to and between London's main airports.

Rail privatisation should encourage rather than delay investment in infrastructure. Privatisation should allow greater use of private sector skills in encouraging investment and will also allow greater access to private sector finance. Railtrack's investment programme will be commercially driven, and will therefore be more directly responsive to the demands of its customers. Both operators and passengers will benefit because Railtrack will have incentives to use investment to increase efficiency.

Locomotives

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many British Rail locomotives have been (a) scrapped since 1992 and (b) offered for sale; and if he will make a statement. [529]

Mr. Watts: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Noise Abatement Notices

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions over the past five years British Rail has been successfully prosecuted or served with abatement notices under noise or air pollution regulations. [16]

Mr. Watts: Complete records of the service of abatement notices or of successful prosecutions under noise and air pollution regulations are not held centrally by British Rail. The information available shows that there has been one successful prosecution in the past five years. Abatement notices have been served on at least two occasions.

Public Inquiry (A1)

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the sampling of pollution taken by Mr. A. J. Hickman in the Ferrybridge area as submitted to public inquiry by the Highways Agency in respect of the A1 diversion. [1314]

Mr. Watts: We are satisfied as to the adequacy of the pollution samples taken by Mr. Hickman.

Toll Road Contracts

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated cost to public funds of the first four shadow toll road contracts over the length of each contract. [1502]

Mr. Watts: Commercial negotiations have not yet concluded, but we expect to benefit from substantial private sector efficiencies.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1440]

Mr. Norris: My Department has cut energy use cumulatively as follows:

1991–92: –6.9 per cent.

1993–94: –12.4 per cent.

1994–95: –16.9 per cent.

Transport, London

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the future of transport in London. [2047]

Sir George Young: The Government will publish a document setting out our transport strategy for London in the new year.

I warmly welcome London Pride's action programme for transport in London. It is an important contribution to the transport debate. I believe London Pride is right to highlight London's excellent international links and the improved quality of public transport. The Government will consider carefully the recommendations made by London Pride in preparing our own strategy document.

Speed Limits (Paddington-Plymouth Line)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport where are each of the speed restrictions currently in place between Paddington and Plymouth; for how long is each; and what the speed restriction is in each case; and in each case when he expects the track to be repaired so the restriction can be lifted. [1323]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack informs me that there are approximately 16 speed restrictions currently in place between Paddington and Plymouth. Information regarding the precise location, length, and speed limit for each speed restriction is not held centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, Railtrack confirms that repair time scales are in accordance with both operational requirements and Railtrack's rigorous safety standards.

Scottish Air Traffic Control Centre

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what changes have occurred in respect of the time scales set out in his answer of 13 December 1994, Official Report, column 549, for the implementation of the new Scottish air traffic control centre; and if he will list the parties responsible for achieving the objectives. [1325]

Mr. Norris: Primary responsibility for achieving objectives for the implementation of the new Scottish centre will lie with the successful tenderer for the contract. The National Air Traffic Service will, however, be responsible for the safety and operational aspects of the project.

NATS expects the new Scottish centre to become operational in the winter of 2000–2001.

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the new en-route air traffic control centre at Swanwick will become operational; and to what extent this is in accordance with the original time scales for the project. [1217]

Mr. Norris: The CAA presented a case for a new air traffic control centre to the Government in 1987. The target date set for the centre to enter operation was the end of 1996.

The Swanwick centre programme has met all its major milestones to date. It is now in its most testing phase, and some software integration problems have been experienced. This is not unusual in a project of this complexity. Currently, the problems are not expected to affect the plan for the new centre to be on line to meet the traffic demands of the summer of 1997.

Air Traffic Control Delays

Mr. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he holds on the amount of additional fuel used by aeroplanes subjected to air traffic control delays above (a) Heathrow airport and (b) Gatwick airport in each of the past five years. [1205]

Mr. Norris: None.

M66

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if contracts have been let for completion of the M66 motorway; and on what date he intends to announce successful bids. [447]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 20 November 1995]: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Michael Meacher, dated 21 November 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking if contracts have been let for completion of the M66 motorway and on what date he intends to announce successful bids.

As you know, the first two contracts are underway. We have let recently a contract for advance works for the next phase and that work will begin on 27 November. We are currently assessing tenders for that next phase with the aim of starting work next year. You will appreciate that I cannot give a firm date for an announcement until we have finished assessing the tenders. Tenders for the final phase will follow on.

Train Stock

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list, under the titles of each of those leasing companies who own the former British Railways coach stock, the names of the operating companies who currently lease the stock, indicating its nature and approximate quantity for each lessee. [224]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 20 November 1995]: At 31 March 1995, the vehicles leased were as follows:

Ferry Disaster, Thailand

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the recent ferry disaster in Thailand and its consequences for future maritime legislation. [344]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 20 November 1995]: The Government have made no formal assessment of the accident because it did not involve a UK-flagged ship and did not occur in United Kingdom waters. However, under the international convention for the safety of life at sea, the appropriate responsible administrations are required to investigate casualties where they judge that this may assist in determining what changes in rules are needed, and undertake to supply the International Maritime Organisation with pertinent information. The IMO makes this information available to members.

SCOTLAND

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the outturn expenditure on regional selective assistance in 1994–95: and what was the amount originally budgeted for that purpose. [1328]

Mr. Kynoch: Gross outturn expenditure on regional selective assistance in 1994–95 was £77.128 million; taking into account receipts of £0.866 million, net outturn expenditure was £76,262 million. Planned gross expenditure for that year had been £77 million with planned receipts of £1.3 million, giving planned net expenditure of £75.7 million.

DEFENCE

Low Flying

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of booked movements into each low-level operational training area in each year since their establishment. [526]

Mr. Soames: The number of operational low-flying movements authorised into each of the three tactical training areas in each year since their establishment is set out in the following table.

	Northern Scotland	Central Wales	Borders
1979	664	123	—

1993	468	192	2,389
1994	704	89	1,127
1995[1]	285	119	1,144

[1] January–September.

From July 1988 to September 1993 the borders TTA was divided into east and west sectors. Movements for the two sectors were counted separately so that sorties which crossed the border between the two sectors generated additional movements. The figures for the borders TTA from 1988 to 1993 therefore overstate the amount of activity in comparison with other years and TTAs.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the instructions to RAF police conducting covert surveys of low flying include a requirement to record instances of use of reheat by low-flying aircraft. [425]

Mr. Soames: RAF police personnel conducting covert monitoring are required to record the use of reheat by military aircraft flying at low level.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on (a) the nationality and (b) the types of the aircraft listed in his evidence to the Defence Committee, HC 314 of Session 1993–94, on operational low-flying movements in 1986 in the "other" category. [430]

Mr. Soames: All operational low flying in the United Kingdom low flying system in 1986 was conducted by UK military aircraft. Thirty-four of the movements listed for 1986 in the "other" category were conducted by F4 Phantom aircraft; the statistical information available does not record aircraft type for the remainder.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which of the aircraft types listed in his evidence to the Defence Committee, HC 314 of Session 1993–94, on operational low-flying movements were (a) equipped and (b) authorised to carry out flying in the highlands restricted area. [429]

Mr. Soames: The Tornado GR1 is the only RAF aircraft equipped to fly in the highlands restricted area. Operational low flying is not permitted in the highlands restricted area when it is active.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if operational low-flying movements by aircraft types other than Buccaneer, Harrier, Hercules, Jaguar and Tornado have taken place since 1988. [527]

Mr. Soames: No.

Exercise Air Warrior

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties were flown by Royal Air Force Harriers during their deployment to Nellis Air Force base for the Air Warrior exercise in August 1994. [1312]

Mr. Soames: A total of 202 sorties were flown by RAF Harriers during Exercise Air Warrior.

Italian Tornado

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of support provided by the Royal Air Force to a training detachment of Italian Air Force Tornado aircraft at Goose bay, Canada, in April to May 1995; and what proportion of this amount was recovered from the Italian authorities. [1283]

Mr. Soames: The Royal Air Force incurred total costs of £118.36 for laundry services provided to the Italian Air Force. It was not considered necessary to recover this.

Strike Command

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what means are used to ensure that locations or features selected for inclusion in the Strike Command list of simulated targets for toss or dive attack referred to in his answer of 18 October 1993, Official Report, column 54, have not been included in previous editions of the list. [1107]

Mr. Soames: Simulated targets are included on the Strike Command list on the basis of their current suitability whether or not they have previously been listed.

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [37]

Mr. Soames: No such Acts have been introduced by my Department since January 1994.

Exercise Red Flag

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties were flown by each type of Royal Air Force aircraft during Exercise Red Flag 94–2. [1311]

Mr. Soames: A total of 298 Tornado GR1 sorties were flown during this exercise.

Flying Training

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what were the dates of arrival and departure of Royal Air Force aircraft deployed to Goose bay for flying training in the 1994 season; [1277]

(2) what were the dates of arrival and departure of Royal Air Force aircraft deployed to Goose bay for flying training in the 1995 season. [1313]

Mr. Soames: Royal Air Force aircraft were deployed to Goose bay for flying training as follows:

Hercules	13–17 March	23–28 January
Tornado GR1	14 April–27 June 1 August–26 September	6 July–27 September

Operation Deliberate Force

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which RAF aircraft participated in Operation Deliberate Force. [362]

Mr. Soames: Harrier GR7, Jaguar GR1B, Tornado F3, E3D, Tristar K1 and Nimrod.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying hours were involved in Operation Deliberate Force. [363]

Mr. Soames: A total of 902.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Harrier GR7s took part in Operation Deliberate Force. [367]

Mr. Soames: Twelve.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the bombs dropped during Operation Deliberate Force were dropped by Harrier GR7s in daylight raids; and what proportion were dropped on night missions. [368]

Mr. Soames: All of the bombs dropped by the RAF during Operation Deliberate Force were delivered by Harrier GR7s in daylight missions.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Jaguars GR1Bs took part in Operation Deliberate Force. [365]

Mr. Soames: Three.

School Places, North Devon

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department made of the extra number of school places needed in North Devon due to the Royal Marines moving from Plymouth to Chivenor; and if he will make a statement about discussions on this matter with Devon county council. [228]

Mr. Soames: The number of service families projected to move into the Chivenor area with children likely to require local schooling was assessed in the feasibility study. Discussions with the North Devon district council and with local headmasters commenced at the earliest stages, and these are continuing. Indications are that the number of children requiring places in local authority schools will be of the order of 110. It is not possible to be precise since families will exercise free choice over educational provision for their children. Given the departure of a number of RAF families with school-age children, contacts with the relevant authorities in North Devon indicate that there is unlikely to be a need for any net increase in the provision of school places.

Capital Works Costs

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what capital costs have been incurred by his Department since 1990 at (a) Seaton barracks and (b) Coypool, Plymouth. [229]

Mr. Soames: The sums spent on capital works projects at Seaton barracks and Royal Marine Coypool since the beginning of the financial year 1990–91 are £1.916 million and £1.909 million respectively.

Chivenor

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the projected annual cost of providing transport between Plymouth and Chivenor for marines who have been transferred to Chivenor but are quartered in Plymouth. [230]

Mr. Soames: A temporary bus service is currently in place, primarily for personnel whose families are awaiting a move into family quarters at Royal Marines barracks Chivenor. This interim arrangement is planned to last a matter of months, until the units settle into Chivenor, and it is estimated that it will cost less than £5,000. This sum was included in the investment appraisal attached to the consultation document published in July 1995.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the consultants appointed to advise his Department abut the transfer of marines from Plymouth to Chivenor; and if he will list their previous experience advising on military matters and the fees paid to them. [231]

Mr. Soames: The feasibility study on the use of Chivenor by units of the Royal Marines Command was headed by DHV Consultants Ltd. of Plymouth, a firm experienced in consultancy work for the Ministry of Defence. Assisting in the overall study were the architects Stride Treglown, mechanical and electrical engineering specialists Torpy and Partners, and quantity surveyors A.L. Currie and Brown, all of Plymouth. The advice given by particular consultants was strictly confined to their areas of expertise as described. Military judgment and views were supplied by members of the Royal Marines Command and other relevant MOD branches. The cost of the option studies carried out was of the order of £130,000, inclusive of VAT.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the cost of capital building work carried out at RAF Chivenor since 1987, indicating when the work was carried out; and if he will give an assessment of the cost of additional capital work that will be required to accommodate the Royal Marines. [232]

Mr. Soames: Since 1987, £5,223,000 has been spent on capital works projects at RAF Chivenor. Work was carried out in 1987, 1992, and 1993. As indicated in the published consultative document, the estimated cost of capital works required to adapt existing facilities and provide new buildings at Chivenor to meet the agreed technical statements of requirements for the two units is £19.5 million.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of the additional cost to be borne by Devon county council for road improvements resulting from the transfer of Royal Marines from Plymouth to Chivenor. [233]

Mr. Soames: The ability of local roads to handle traffic from Royal Marines units moving to Chivenor formed part of the feasibility study which preceded the relocation proposal. Analysis was based on the use which the relevant units made of the roads in the Plymouth area and of the existing use made by civilian vehicles of the roads in North Devon. The North Devon authorities have been carefully consulted throughout. Overall, it was concluded that no road improvements would be needed as a direct result of these units moving to Chivenor.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of removing essential equipment from RAF Chivenor, following the decision to transfer the RAF; and what the cost will be of reinstating this equipment for use by the marines. [234]

Mr. Soames: The Royal Air Force and Royal Marines have worked closely together on the handover of Chivenor. Beyond such things as catering and domestic equipment, which has been left in place, there is no overlap between the equipment essential to the operation of an RAF unit with 44 jet aircraft and that of two Royal Marine Command units holding a variety of specialist battlefield logistic and engineering equipment. No costs are therefore foreseen.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the Royal Marines transferring from Plymouth to Chivenor will occupy married quarters in North Devon; and how many will remain in the quarters in Plymouth. [235]

Mr. Soames: To minimise family disruption, it is left to individual families to decide whether to move when its service member is posted elsewhere—subject to their current family quarter not being required for higher priority purposes. Nevertheless, indications are that a total of 156 Royal Marine Commando families will have moved to Chivenor by early in the new year.

Ships

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names and dates of (a) the surface vessels and (b) the submarines which have been mothballed by his Department in the last five years; and if he will list the last refit date of each of these together with the cost of refit. [1335]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Royal Navy ships are routinely cycled through varying degrees of readiness—for example, when undergoing refit—but only one vessel, HMS Andromeda, has been placed in long term storage during the last five years. Andromeda entered this state in June 1993. Her previous refit took place between August 1990 and December 1991 at a cost of some £27 million. She was formally decommissioned in November 1994.

Army Vehicles

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the decision to purchase ambulances to meet the Army's requirements; [1333]

(2) if he will make a statement concerning the Army's future requirement for ambulances; how many ambulances are required; which companies are tendering for the contract; and what is the value of the contract; [1331]

(3) what assessment he has made of (a) ambulances made by Land-Rover and (b) ambulances made by Steyr-Daimler Puch. [1332]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Army's requirement for a medium mobility ambulance to ensure casualty evacuation from forward areas was announced in 1992. It will replace the ageing fleet of battlefield ambulances.

Iveco-Ford, Land-Rover and Steyr-Daimler Puch have submitted competitive tenders to meet the requirement. These are currently being assessed. It would not be appropriate to make any further comments while the assessment is in progress.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department purchased Pinzgauer Steyr-Daimler Puch vehicles to meet the Army's light vehicle truck requirement; how many vehicles were purchased; what was the cost of these vehicles; how the Army's requirement for these vehicles differed from that provided by the RB-44 light vehicle; and if he will make a statement. [1334]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The contract to supply 394 vehicles to meet the Army's requirement for the heavy duty version of the medium-sized utility truck—with a 1.4 tonne payload—was placed with Steyr-Daimler Puch in June 1994, at a cost of some £20 million, inclusive of support costs.

This category of vehicle was a new requirement as a result of the changing role of the armed forces and the increased emphasis on flexibility and mobility, and provides a different capability from the 2-tonne payload RB-44 heavy utility truck.

Royal Naval College, Greenwich

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the organisations and individuals who have submitted expressions of interest in taking a lease on the buildings currently occupied by the Royal Naval college in Greenwich, indicating in each case the nature of the organisation and the uses which it proposes for the buildings. [356]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 20 November 1995]: Eight expressions of interest have been lodged in respect of all of the buildings comprising the Royal Naval college, Greenwich, with a further three lodged in respect of parts of the complex. It is my Department's policy not to disclose the identity of sponsors of expressions of interest on the grounds of commercial confidentiality. Sponsors are however free to reveal their own identity. The expression of interest will now be assessed and we will make an announcement in due course.

Ship and Submarine Sales

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) surface ships and (b) submarines sold by his Department in each of the last five years. [461]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 20 November 1995]: A list of surface ships and submarines sold in each of the last five years is as follows.

HEALTH

Abortions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to hold centrally information by regional health authorities on the percentage of parents who decline to abort a pregnancy when told that their child may have a birth defect; and if he will make a statement. [61]

Mr. Sackville: There are no such plans.

Prescriptions (Students)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many claims for free prescriptions have been made by students; and how many have been successful for the latest year for which figures are available. [1059]

Mr. Malone: During 1994–95, around 260,000 national health service low—income scheme claims were made by students, of which around 68 per cent. resulted in entitlement to free prescriptions.

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he proposes to implement the report of the Defence Select Committee regarding Gulf war syndrome; and if he will make a statement. [563]

Mr. Soames: I have been asked to reply.

We will be considering the points made by the Defence Select Committee very carefully and will reply formally in due course.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many liability orders have been placed on members of the armed forces by the Child Support Agency for each month since April 1993. [618]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 20 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about liability orders.

No data on the number of liability orders granted during 1993–94 are available. It is unlikely that there will have been many during this period as few cases would have progressed to this stage from the start of the Agency.

A total of 226 liability orders were granted during 1994–95. From April 1995, a monthly breakdown is available, and this is shown in the table attached.

It is not possible to say how many of these liability orders have been granted against members of the armed forces—or any other employment group—as there is no business need for the Agency to collect this information. However, the vast majority of liability orders are directed towards the self employed, because non-compliant absent parents who are employees would normally be subject to deduction from earnings orders; nearly all members of the armed forces are employees.

Liability orders granted 1995–96—Year to date

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Children's Play

Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will announce the name of the organisation that will be carrying out work on children's play on behalf of her Department. [1665]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am grateful to all those organisations that submitted tenders to carry out work in the areas of information dissemination, playwork education and training and play safety. I have today informed the National Playing Fields Association that, subject to the successful completion of post-tender negotiations, it will carry out all three functions for my Department from 1 January 1996.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sri Lanka

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have recently been made to the Government of Sri Lanka. [565]

Mr. Hanley: Our high commissioner in Colombo is in frequent contact with members of the Sri Lankan Government. I refer the hon. Member to a declaration made by the European Union on 15 November. A copy is being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which areas of Sri Lanka have been defined as safe for (a) Sri Lankan nationals and (b) others; and when he last reviewed this policy. [13]

Mr. Hanley: Our current travel advice for visitors to Sri Lanka is set out below. It is under constant review and was last updated on 15 November.

Peace talks between the Government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam—LTTE—broke down on 19 April and fighting is on-going in the north and east. Do not visit these areas. On 7 August, a bomb exploded in central Colombo, killing 21 people and injuring over 50. There were further similar incidents in October and November. More can be expected. Curfews may be imposed from time to time. Although foreigners are unlikely to be directly targeted, visitors should exercise extreme caution in public places. The south and centre, including all the main tourist areas and the cultural triangle, remain largely unaffected. Further information may be obtained direct from the British high commission in Colombo: Tel: 437336, Fax 430308.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current political, military and refugee situation in Sri Lanka. [567]

Mr. Hanley: We welcome President Kumaratunga's recent statements that the conflict in Sri Lanka can be resolved only through a negotiated settlement. We believe that the Government of Sri Lanka's devolution proposals form a basis for discussion on a settlement acceptable to all Sri Lankans.

We have urged both the Government of Sri Lanka and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam—LTTE—to make every effort to protect the civilian population. We welcome the Government's recent statements concerning the shipment of relief supplies to the north.

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [42]

Mr. Hanley: None.

Arms Exports (Iraq)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what dates his Department was informed of contracts relating to (a) Project Babylon, (b) Baby Babylon and (c) Supergun propellant; and what was the response his Department made. [1033]

Mr. Hanley: It has not proved possible, in the time available, to establish the exact dates at which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was first informed of the contracts relating to the projects which subsequently became known as Project Babylon and Supergun. It is likely that the inquiry currently being conducted by Sir Richard Scott will comment further on these matters. Following the detention, on 10 April 1990 at Teesport by HM Customs, of eight steel tubes destined for Iraq, the FCO liaised with other interested departments and agencies while Her Majesty's Customs continued its inquiries.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the outcome of the investigations into possible offences by United Kingdom based companies or their subsidiaries in connection with the supply of products to the Iraqi plant at Ad Dwar and Salman Pak arising from information passed to him by UNSCOM; if any of the investigations have indicated that Her Majesty's Government had prior knowledge or approved any of these trades; if all the documents and information in the possession of Her Majesty's Government relating to these matters have been passed to the Scott inquiry; and if he will make a statement. [329]

Mr. David Davis: We are aware neither of offences against UK export control legislation by any British company associated with these sites, nor prior knowledge by the Government of illegal trade. The Scott inquiry has been kept informed of all matters within its remit.

We shall continue to support the UN special commission. Any allegations or evidence of wrong-doing by British companies will be investigated and, if appropriate, will be a matter for the courts.

Dependent Territories

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many former right hon. and hon. Members have been appointed as governors of dependent territories since 1979. [418]

Mr. Hanley: Two

Jonathon Moyle

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the outcome of the Chilean authorities' investigation into the death of Jonathon Moyle; and if he will make a statement. [332]

Mr. Hanley: The investigation by the Chilean authorities into the death of Jonathon Moyle is continuing. The Chilean Appeal Court ordered further investigations in October 1993, as did the Chilean Supreme Court in April 1995.

HM coroner for Exeter and east Devon is conducting a separate inquest, which has not yet been finalised.

General Communications Headquarters

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the intended capacity of GCHQ after 1999, on the reasons for the proposed closure of the Culmhead station and on the arrangements for the personnel at present stationed there. [599]

Mr. Rifkind: GCHQ will maintain its capability up to and beyond 1999 but will be able to reduce its staff numbers to about 5,000 by 1999 by moving to more efficient methods of operation. The decision to close the composite signals organisation station at Culmhead was the result of a periodic review of resources and was in response to anticipated changes in requirements and technological advances which will enable GCHQ to become more efficient by consolidating some of its operations. As far as possible the run-down at Culmhead will be achieved through voluntary retirements and redeployments, but some compulsory redundancies appear inevitable. Full support to those affected will be provided by GCHQ's personnel and welfare service and an outplacement scheme.

Monetary Union

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what procedures are necessary for the ratification by (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other nations of changes made to the convergence criteria of the Maastricht treaty or of new criteria made or added by the 1996 IGC. [1099]

Mr. David Davis: The Government do not expect discussion of the Maastricht convergence criteria to the 1996 intergovernmental conference.

Social Chapter

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what legislation has been agreed by the European Union, arising from the social chapter of the Single European Act treaty or the work programme arising from the social charter agreed in Strasbourg by the European Council in 1989, which by virtue of the protocol on social policy in the treaty on European Union does not apply to the United Kingdom; what articles authorised such legislation; and what proposals in or likely to be in this category of legislation is before either the Council of Ministers or the Council of Permanent Representatives. [1495]

Mr. David Davis: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Education and Employment today.

Wilton Park

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent review of the Wilton Park agency. [1897]

Mr. Hanley: A prior options review has been carried out on Wilton Park, which has been an executive agency of the FCO since 1991. The review concludes that Wilton Park conferences organised on behalf of the FCO fulfil a valuable function, and that Wilton Park should continue to operate as a next steps agency. The review also makes recommendations for involving FCO geographical commands and departments more closely in Wilton Park conferences; for improving the marketing of the conferences among potential participants and for the market testing of the commercial—non-conference—operation at Wilton Park. The outcome of the review has been endorsed by Ministers, and action to implement it is in hand. A summary of the review's findings has been deposited in the Library of the House.

Taiwan

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has reviewed his policy on placing visas for the United Kingdom in Taiwan passports. [1898]

Mr. Hanley: We have compared our practice of issuing visas with a number of other countries which, like us, do not recognise Taiwan. I have agreed, with effect from 1 December, that visas for the UK should be placed in travel documents issued by the Taiwan authorities. We regard such travel documents as no more than confirming the identity of the holder. Our change in practice does not involve recognition of Taiwan or constitute acceptance by the Government of a Taiwanese nationality.

Nigeria

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the measures being adopted by Her Majesty's Government to persuade the Nigerian authorities to adopt democratic values and to safeguard human rights in Nigeria. [1501]

Mr. Hanley: Details of measures in force since 1993 were set out in a written answer to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on 2 December 1993, Official Report, column 680. On 11 November 1995, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced a full arms embargo against the Nigerian regime. We are considering further options with our EU partners.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the use of a room in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 17 October by the British-Nigerian Chamber of Commerce for a cocktail party; and how many Government officials were present. [1208]

Mr. Hanley: The reception was hosted and paid for by the UK chapter of the British-Nigerian Chamber of Commerce, not the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Two junior FCO officials, and two from the DTI, attended the reception. No Nigerian ministers were present.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the dates of all official visits of members of the Nigerian military regime to Britain since 18 November 1993. [1210]

Mr. Hanley: Since the European Union suspension of high-level visits to and from Nigeria in November 1993 there have been no official visits by members of the Nigerian Government (Provisional Ruling Council and Federal Executive Council) to Britain.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the dates of all private visits of members of the Nigerian military regime to Britain since 18 November 1993. [1211]

Mr. Hanley: Since the European Union restriction of visas for members of the military and their families in June 1993, exemptions have been made only on rare occasions for pressing medical visits.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade who will succeed Sir Derek Hornby as chairman of the British Overseas Trade Board. [1977]

Mr. Nelson: I am delighted to announce that Martin Laing CBE, chairman of John Laing PLC, will succeed Sir Derek Hornby as chairman of the British Overseas Trade Board—BOTB. Sir Derek will retire following this afternoon's meeting of the BOTB, after five most distinguished years.

EU Industry Council

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Industry Council held in Brussels on 6 and 7 November. [1976]

Mr. Eggar: The Council adopted resolutions on the following issues: the role of small and medium-sized enterprises—SMEs—in the process of technological innovation; the industrial aspects of the information society; and the importance of the competitiveness of the European mechanical engineering industry. The Council also agreed conclusions on the following topics: the links between industrial competitiveness and business services; industrial co-operation with other regions and third countries; the feasibility of a European secondary capital market for SMEs; and the interaction between competition policy and industrial competitiveness. The Council reached political agreement, pending examination of the European Parliament's opinion, on a draft Council decision on an action programme to strengthen EU industrial competitiveness.

The Commission made oral presentations on the work of the Commission research-industry task forces and on a forthcoming communication on the promotion of quality as a factor in improving industrial competitiveness. It presented a communication on the impact of international developments on the EU textile and clothing sector.

Political agreement was reached on the text of a Council regulation implementing OECD rules on aid to shipbuilding, with a qualified majority in favour of extending existing Community rules for up to nine months—that is, 1 October 1996—if the OECD agreement had not come into force by then.

On steel, the Commission made a presentation on the monitoring of article 95 cases. I welcomed the Commission's assurance that there would be no resort to article 95 in the future. I shared the Commission's concern about the expiry of the deadline for the 500,000 tonnes of capacity reductions in Italy. Italy promised to provide a new proposal on how this would be achieved within the following two weeks. There was a brief discussion on the Commission's proposal to amend the environmental provisions of the steel aid code.

The most difficult issue on the agenda was the Irish article 95 request for Council assent to state aid to be made in relation to Irish Steel. We have serious concerns about the principle of further state aid to the steel industry. This request caused particular difficulties for the United Kingdom and Luxembourg, where steel plants compete with Irish Steel and where jobs could consequently be put at risk by the injection of the proposed aid. Some progress was made towards formulating possible conditions which could be attached to any aid, but it did not prove possible to reach agreement at the meeting. It was agreed that further discussions would take place.

Finally, under other business, there was a short discussion on the follow-up to the Molitor report on administrative simplification. There was also a brief exchange of views on the Commission's plans to propose a strategic environmental assessment directive, which would amend directive 85/337/EEC. I warned that it was essential not to undermine the competitiveness of key industrial sectors through the imposition of excessive regulatory burdens.

No votes were taken at the Council.

Offshore Oil and Gas Licensing

Mr. Brazier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will announce the blocks to be offered in the 17th round of offshore oil and gas licensing on the United Kingdom continental shelf. [1552]

Mr. Page: I have decided to offer 275 blocks for licensing in 68 tranches or groups in the 17th offshore licensing round. We are entering real frontier territory with some of the tranches nearly as far west as Rockall. It is a reflection of the potential of the UK continental shelf that after 30 years of exploration, there are still exciting new areas to search.

Tranches vary from two to 13 blocks, depending on perceived prospectivity, location and water depth, and are chosen so that companies can consider all of the different areas available. I am offering blocks in groups because relatively little is known about the areas being offered.

Most of the tranches offered—41—are in the Rockall trough, located east of Rockall and to the south-west of the recent discoveries in the west of Shetland area. The trough is an area where little exploration has taken place but which has considerable potential for significant discoveries.

Tranches are also offered to the south-west of England, to the north of Scotland and of the east coast of England. Some are in areas that have not been explored before or were once considered unprospective. The fact that these blocks are not of interest to the industry shows how new technology and ideas can challenge long-established perceptions.

Since the areas offered are comparatively unknown, companies will have a year in which to prepare their applications. This gives them an opportunity to acquire seismic data during the "weather window" next summer and to process and analyse it before committing themselves. Instead of the usual six years, successful applicants for these tranches will have nine years in which to carry out their agreed work programmes. At this stage, I am asking companies to commit to a programme for the first three years only because of the uncertainties of exploring such new areas.

Companies will be expected to show commitment to the future of the UK continental shelf by coming forward with new ideas, and keeping up the momentum for increasing competitiveness and cutting costs. The objective of the 17th round is to encourage exploration in new areas and so to continue the development of our oil and gas resources into the next century.

Applicants must show awareness of available information on environmental resources in the area for which they are applying. They must assess the potential impact of their proposed work programmes on the environment and identify how any adverse effects can be avoided or minimised.

Conditions to be attached to licences in this round to safeguard the environment have been agreed with the Joint Nature Conservation Committee. Restrictions also cover the interests of other users of the sea such as fishing, defence and transport.

We have conducted a wide-ranging consultation exercise on the 691 blocks which were nominated by the industry in march, involving other Government Departments, local authorities and environmental groups. In all a total of over 70 organisations have provided advice.

The 17th round completes the three-round licensing cycle announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Energy in April 1994. The 15th round awarded blocks in established areas in the central North sea and southern gas basin. The 16th round awards, which I announced during the summer, covered areas to the west of Shetland and around the coast of Britain.

Applications for the 17th round are required by noon on Wednesday 27 November 1996. Licence awards should be announced during the spring of 1997.

I will now publish in the Official Journal of the European Communities a formal announcement giving the detailed terms for the 17th round, including the format of applications, the information required with the application and the basis on which awards will be made.

Energy Technology Support Unit

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many inquiries the energy technology support unit has received from the general public about renewable energy (a) in total since the energy technology support unit was established and (b) on average per year. [201]

Mr. Page: The energy technology support unit has received some 70,000 inquiries of all types since 1 April 1989, when the Renewable Energy Enquiries Bureau commissioned a database to record inquiries. Statistics for inquiries before that date are not available.

Since 1 April 1989, inquiries have averaged 12,000 annually across a range of correspondent types, with roughly 18 per cent. of inquiries coming from private individuals, 30 per cent. from commerce and industry and 45 per cent. from education; 7 per cent. were from other inquirers.

As renewable energy has moved to the marketplace, inquiries from companies have increased and, across the last two financial years—1993–94 and 1994–95—have averaged 39 per cent.—over 8,800—of the nearly 23,000 inquiries received.

British Coal Pensions

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what revenues he expects to generate from the disposal of the British Coal pension fund management company and the British coal pension fund venture capital company. [533]

Mr. Page: These are matters for British Coal. I understand that disposal of the British Coal pension fund management company is still being negotiated. I am asking the chairman to write to the hon. Member once the two disposals have been completed.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many times a month his Department liaises with the Ministry of Defence in respect of support for the aerospace industry. [1009]

Mr. Eggar: My Department has very frequent contact with the Ministry of Defence on a wide range of issues relevant to the aerospace sector including the support which both Departments provide to the industry. The exact number of contacts is not recorded.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is his Department's policy to maintain the United Kingdom's total capacity in the aerospace industry; and what Government assistance is available to achieve this. [1011]

Mr. Eggar: The United Kingdom aerospace industry is a valuable contributor to the UK economy with a consistent trade surplus since 1980. My Department recognises the importance of the industry and has provided over £1.6 billion in support since 1979 for a number of major civil aerospace projects, mainly in the form of launch aid support. Aerospace benefits from a dedicated DTI budget for research through the civil aircraft research and demonstration programme—CARAD. Assistance for export projects is provided by the Export Credits Guarantee Department. Decisions on capacity are a matter for individual companies; but the DTI works to promote the aerospace industry's competitiveness by supporting the Society of British Aerospace Companies' competitiveness challenge. It also supports the industry in forging international partnerships and pursuing major export opportunities and will continue to stimulate collaboration in technology acquisition through the national strategic technology acquisition plan—NSTAP—and the technology foresight initiatives.

Airbus

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the British share of the Airbus consortium; how many jobs result from that share; and what plans the Government have to increase their share of the consortium. [1013]

Mr. Eggar: British Aerospace has a 20 per cent. share in Airbus Industrie. The Government have no share in the Airbus consortium; questions relating to BAe's share are a matter for the company. Over 25,000 British workers are directly involved in the Airbus programmes.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many new jobs the Airbus consortium expects to create by 2010. [1008]

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Aerospace and the other partners in the Airbus consortium.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the predicted rise of Airbus' fleet capacity by 2010, expressing the figures in terms of (a) real capacity and (b) world market share. [1007]

Mr. Eggar: (a) Airbus Industrie forecasts a world-wide requirement for about 13,000 new large civil aircraft, valued at about $1,000 billion, by 2014.

(b) Airbus hopes to increase its share of the market over this period from 30 per cent. to 50 per cent.

Bullying

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to combat bullying in the workplace; and if he will make a statement. [1004]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Employees who are experiencing bullying in the workplace should in the first instance take this up with their employer, making use of any internal grievance procedures. The Health and Safety Executive's recently published booklet, "Stress at Work: A Guide for Employers", provides advice on preventing ill health though stress which may be caused by persistent bullying. Bullying could constitute grounds for a complaint of constructive unfair dismissal to an industrial tribunal and under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 it is a criminal offence to cause intentional harassment, alarm or distress.

Patent Office

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff are currently employed in the Patent Office; and what are the staff projections for each of the next three years. [1199]

Mr. Ian Taylor: At the end of October 973 staff were employed at the Patent Office. Forecasts of staff levels are set out in the 1995 corporate plan, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Relevant figures are:

1996–97: 920

A major factor in employment will be the level of demand.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to privatise the Patent Office, and if he will make a statement. [1201]

Mr. Taylor: I have nothing to add to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the then President of the Board of Trade on 14 December 1994, Official Report, columns 657–58.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the tender specifications applying to services to be contracted-out from the Patent Office. [1198]

Mr. Taylor: The specification for the London front office and facilities management are now at an advanced stage.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade to what extent patent and trademark work currently undertaken within the Manchester offices of the Patent Office is included in the contracting-out specification which will apply to the marketing and information directorate. [1200]

Mr. Taylor: The Manchester office is not within the scope of any study of the marketing and information directorate. Its future is however under separate review. The legal requirement to maintain an office in Manchester ended with the implementation of the Trade Marks Act 1994.

Assisted Areas Map

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next expects to review the assisted areas map; if he will accept interim submissions from areas excluded in the last review; and if he will make a statement. [227]

Mr. Eggar: The Government have no plans to review the assisted areas map during this Parliament. The European Commission imposes an overall ceiling on the percentage of working population covered by the assisted areas map. It is not possible to review the status of individual areas outside a full review.

Telephone Ownership

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the number of privately owned telephones by (a) region and (b) county; and if he will make a statement. [607]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 20 November 1995]: At end March 1994 there were approximately 20.94 million residential exchange lines nationwide. Overall data by region and county are not held. Telephone ownership has risen in the United Kingdom from 78 per cent. per household in 1984 to 91 per cent. today. I share the objective of the Director General of Telecommunications to increase that figure still further.

In rural areas, access will be helped by use of the radio spectrum that was released recently.

Nanotechnology

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new proposals he has to increase research into and application of nanotechnology. [346]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 20 November 1995]: The Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council manages a programme in nanotechnology which funds a variety of research in universities. The budget for new commitments by the programme was increased to £1 million per annum this year. The Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council funds a research project in nanotechnology but has no plans to increase its activity in this area.

Telephone Disconnections

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the number of telephone connections cut off by British Telecom each year since privatisation; and if he will make a statement. [606]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 20 November 1995]: That is a matter for BT. However, following a request from the Director General of Telecommunications, monthly figures for BT disconnections covering the period July 1994 to September 1995 have been placed in the Oftel library. These show average total disconnections of around 64,000 per month, and average net disconnections of around 26,000 per month—the net average excludes cases where customers were rapidly re-connected after payment of bills. Responsibility for the provision of universal telecoms service falls to the Director General of Telecommunications, who has taken a close interest in all telecoms operators' policies towards disconnection. He is working to develop more innovative approaches to affordable and equitable access to telecommunications, where outright disconnection of service would form a last resort used only in cases of wilful fraud.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Valley Site, Rhydymwyn

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish and deposit in the Library the Drivers Jonas report of May 1994 on the valley site at Rhydymwyn, Clwyd. [596]

Mr. Boswell: A copy of the environment assessment of May 1994 which was prepared by Dames and Moore but which was commissioned by Drivers Jonas on behalf of the Ministry has been placed in the Library of the House today.

Fish Landings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to restrict fish landings to specified ports and regions for fish to be sold through auction; and if he will make a statement on measures to stop black fish landings. [987]

Mr. Baldry: The fisheries departments devote substantial resources to detecting and preventing illegal landings and appropriate enforcement action is taken where there is evidence of illegal landings occurring. Designated ports and approved auction sales are among the additional control measures which are kept under review.

Fish Quotas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the species which the Commission is proposing should be subject to quotas under the common fisheries policy. [1003]

Mr. Baldry: The following fish species are subject to quotas under the common fisheries policy:

Anchovy
Anglerfish
Atlantic Salmon
Blue Ling and Ling
Blue Whiting
Capelin
Catfish
Cod
Common Sole
Greenland Halibut
Haddock
Hake

Herring
Horse Mackerel
Mackerel
Megrim
Northern Prawn
Norway Lobster
Norway Pout
Plaice
Polar Cod
Pollack
Redfish
Roundnose Grenadier
Saithe
Sandeel
Sprat
Whiting

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [30]

Mr. Boswell: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has introduced two Acts of Parliament since January 1994.

The Land Drainage Act 1994 amends the Land Drainage Act 1991 in relation to the functions of internal drainage boards and local authorities.

The Agricultural Tenancies Act 1995 does not impose express duties on local government bodies, but any such body acting in the capacity of agricultural landlord or tenant will be subject to the provisions of the Act where applicable.

Chocolate Directive

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement as to the effects on the traditional British chocolate bar of the EU chocolate directive; and what is Her Majesty's Government's position on the directive. [1324]

Mr. Browning: The existing EC Cocoa and Chocolate Products Directive, which was agreed in 1973, lays down, amongst other things, compositional standards for chocolate. Under this directive, the United Kingdom may manufacture, and sell as such, chocolate containing vegetable fat other than cocoa butter. The directive also specifies compositional standards for "milk chocolate" manufactured and sold in the United Kingdom and Ireland; this standard is different from that set for milk chocolate manufactured and sold in other member states.

The EC Commission is undertaking a review of this directive but has not yet placed a proposal before the Council.

Our objective is to see that the compositional standards in the new directive fully cover the wide variety of consumer tastes already established within the Community and that the directive ensures free circulation of all traditional styles of chocolate and chocolate products.

Carbaryl

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to revoke the approval for products containing carbaryl. [1218]

Mrs. Browning: As announced on 7 November, the Government have accepted the advice regarding pesticide uses of carbaryl from the Advisory Committee on Pesticides. The ACP concluded that there was no cause for concern about the risk to consumers from the low levels of residues currently found in food. However, the ACP advised that action should be taken to reduce or remove long term exposure for the users of pesticides containing carbaryl.

Accordingly, the Government have revoked all approvals for carbaryl-containing pesticide products intended for non-agricultural, garden or poultry house use. A one year period of grace will be allowed for stocks already in the supply chain to be used up. The remaining professional pesticide uses will be allowed to continue subject to the tightest practicable controls on the method of application and protective equipment and clothing.

The issue of the safety of carbaryl in veterinary products is under active consideration by the Veterinary Products Committee.

WALES

Acts of Parliament

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the Acts of Parliament, including consolidation Acts, that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [25]

Mr. Hague: Since January 1994, my Department has introduced the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994, which received Royal Assent on 5 July 1994.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [406]

Mr. Hague: None. I travel on London Underground in a personal capacity.

Mid-Wales Airport

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received regarding the establishment of a Mid-Wales airport and if he will make a statement. [1061]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There have been no recent representations about the airport. Mid-Wales airport was established some four years ago with the help of funds provided under the rural initiative scheme. ERDF funds were provided later for a taxiway, hardstanding and control room. Montgomeryshire district council made a bid in February for funds under the strategic development scheme for extending the runway but this was later withdrawn.

Nursery Vouchers

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the organisations and individuals who have responded to his consultation on nursery vouchers, indicating whether they were for or against his proposals. [1203]

Mr. Richards: A list of organisations is given. Responses were also received from 375 individuals and school governing bodies, including two petitions. All comments are currently being analysed.

Emergency Medical Intakes

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what consultations he has had with the chairmen of acute hospitals, trusts and health authorities in relation to the closure of acute hospitals to emergency medical intakes since 1 November; what statistics he has collected on the number of occasions of such intake closures; and if he will make a statement; [1329]

(2) what consultations he has had with chairmen of acute hospitals, trusts and health authorities in Wales in relation to the assessment of the need for emergency medical intake beds, and the availability of such beds since 1 November. [1330]

Mr. Hague: The management of emergency medical intake is primarily an operational issue for health authorities and trusts, on which statistics are not held centrally by my Department. However, to assist with its management, the Welsh Office some months ago commissioned a review of referral practices and I expect the results to be available shortly. In the meantime, discussions between my Department and the NHS are taking place. I expect them to identify action which will address the issue.

Residuary Body for Wales

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to issue additional guidance to the residuary body regarding surplus properties and disputed properties where an activity continues beyond 1 April 1996. [1899]

Mr. Hague: I have today issued, for consultation, revised draft guidance to the residuary body for Wales dealing with property which should be transferred to it. The revised guidance indicates that any property, other than administrative buildings, which is not required by the new authorities for the purpose of carrying out their functions or any property whose future ownership is in dispute should not be transferred to the residuary body where the property is used for an existing activity for the carrying out of which full or part-time staff are wholly employed.

Such properties should normally be transferred to a successor authority or authorities for disposal or resolution of the dispute. In the absence of a local agreement the following will apply: where the property is owned or leased by a non-split district or county it should be transferred to the successor authority; where the property is owned or leased by a split district or county it should be transferred into the joint ownership of the successor authorities.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Mater Hospital

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will outline the subsequent changes to the 1971 deed of arrangement which brought the Mater hospital into the national health service. [68]

Mr. Moss: There has been only one subsequent change to the original deed of arrangement. On 30 August 1984, the Department and the trustees of the Mater infirmorum hospital signed a "supplemental deed of arrangement", specifically designed to permit them jointly to fund the major scheme of reconstruction and modernisation which was officially opened in 1991,

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the current Roman Catholic Church trustees of the Mater hospital. [66]

Mr. Moss: No. Appointment of Roman Catholic Church trustees for the Mater infirmorum hospital is not a matter for my Department and a list of trustees is not held.

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the remit of the Mater hospital trust board's joint consultative committee with the trustees. [65]

Mr. Moss: Under the terms of the deed of arrangement with the trustees which brought the Mater infirmorum hospital into the Health and Personal Social Services in 1971, the joint consultative committee shall consider any proposals by the body responsible for the management of the hospital relating to:

the appointment of senior medical staff;

the appointment of heads of service departments'

ethical practices, particularly in obstetrics, gynaecology, geriatrics and psychiatry; the use of endowments and trust funds; and the use of any part of the hospital as accommodation for a nurses training school.

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Mater hospital Church trustees have (a) representation on the hospital's trust board and (b) consultation rights with hospital's trust board. [67]

Mr. Moss: The trustees of the Mater infirmorum hospital are not represented on its trust board. Under the provisions of article 96 of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972, the deed of arrangement between the Department of Health and Social Services and the hospital trustees requires regard to be had in the general administration of the hospital to the preservation of its Roman Catholic character and association. I have already set out areas specifically affected by these consultation rights in the reply I gave the hon. Gentleman earlier today.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times in the last year he has used (a) the London Underground and (b) London Buses while on official business. [427]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: None.

Housing Bill

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if it is his policy that Northern Ireland will be included in the forthcoming Housing Bill. [75]

Mr. Moss: The matter is under active consideration. I will write to the hon. Gentleman once a decision has been reached.

Teaching Appointments

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what procedures the education boards in Northern Ireland have to ensure that selectors and applicants for school teaching appointments, and in related advertisements, are aware that discrimination on religious or political grounds is lawful when such appointments are made. [73]

Mr. Ancram: Such procedures are a matter for the education and library boards, and other employing authorities as appropriate.

Funding and Planning Council

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to introduce a funding and planning council for further education in Northern Ireland. [1110]

Mr. Ancram: The Government are considering a range of options for the future planning and funding of further education in Northern Ireland.

Out-of-hours Service (GPs)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce the amount for the development fund for out-of-hours service for general practitioners in Northern Ireland. [467]

Mr. Moss: My officials in the Health and Personal Social Services management executive are meeting the profession's representatives on 23 November to discuss the out-of-hours arrangements in Northern Ireland. The profession will be formally notified of the size of the development fund at that meeting.

Murder Prosecutions

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons have been prosecuted for murder in each of the past 10 years; and how many of these persons were prosecuted for murder related to the terrorist campaign. [10]

Sir John Wheeler: The information is as follows:

Number of persons prosecuted for murder 1985–1994

	Terrorist	Non terrorist	Total
1985	38	1	39
1986	24	1	25
1987	10	9	19
1988	12	5	17
1989	11	4	15
1990	8	1	9
1991	9	2	11
1992	7	7	14
1993	17	1	18
1994	13	4	17

These figures refer to the number of persons prosecuted for murder in separate murder trials. A person facing two counts of murder in the same trial is counted once and a person prosecuted for two murders in separate trials is counted twice.

The statistics in the terrorist murder column refer to prosecutions in non-jury Crown courts.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Deportation

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people who, when sentenced to prison, were also recommended for deportation at the conclusion of their sentence were detained in prison following the completion of their sentence; and what was the average period of time for which they were so detained for each of the last three years and in the current year to date; [984]

(2) how many people who, when sentenced to prison, were also recommended for deportation at the conclusion of their sentence, are still detained in prison having completed their sentence. [983]

Mr. Kirkhope: The available information is given in the table. The other information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Persons recommended for deportation by a court detained in prison after completion of a custodial sentence as at 17 November 1995:

Prison Transfers

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were transferred from Styal prison for each month of 1995, indicating the reason for the transfer in each case, and the name of the prison to which the transfer was made. [142]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 21 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners transferred from Styal prison for each month of 1995, the reason for each transfer and the name of the prison to which each transfer was made.

The attached table shows the number of prisoners transferred in each month of 1995 and the destination establishments. Information on the reasons for each transfer is not centrally recorded and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Probation Officers

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received (a) for and (b) against his proposals to eliminate the social work training element for probation officers. [146]

Mr. Kirkhope: Since the government's decisions about probation officer recruitment and training were announced on 2 October, 89 letters have been received, of which 61 were against and 28 were for a break with social work education.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers who have been held in detention have been on hunger strike during the current year. [993]

Mr. Kirkhope: A total of 40 people detained under Immigration Act powers have refused food or fluids at some stage during 1995 up to 17 November. Central records of people who have refused food or fluids do not distinguish between those who have applied for asylum from others, and this information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

As at 17 November only one immigration detainee was refusing food or fluids.

Prison Service

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the projected private sector involvement in the Prison Service; and what was the basis for calculating this figure. [385]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 21 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about projected private sector involvement in the Prison Service.

Our aim is to create a private sector able to provide sustained competition, to improve standards and cost efficiency. There is a commitment that, in the initial phase, about ten per cent of prisons in England and Wales (thirteen in total) will be managed by the private sector.

This strategy is designed to secure continuing and lasting improvements in standards, quality and cost efficiency across the whole of the prison system in England and Wales. For these objectives to be achieved, the private sector must be large enough to provide sustained competition and involve several private sector companies.

Prison Population

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the projected growth in the prison population as a result of measures he announced on 12 October. [137]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her on 26 October Official Report, column 755–56.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of (a) the total prison inmate population of prisons in each of the next five years and (b) the totals of prison places that will be available. [348]

Miss Widdecombe: [holding answer 20 November 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 21 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the estimate of the total prison inmate population of prisons in each of the next five years and the totals of prison places that will be available.

The most recent available projections were published in May as part of the Prison Service's 1995 Corporate Plan. Revised and updated projections will be published in the new year as part of the 1996 Corporate Plan.

Police Constables

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made as to the experience, briefing and training of police constables on the beat. [151]

Mr. Maclean: The way in which beat patrol officers are used is an operational matter for chief constables. The scope and content of the probationer training curriculum is currently being reviewed to ensure that new recruits are equipped with the necessary skills and abilities to undertake this key role.

Victimisation (Homosexuals)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the co-ordinated police initiatives on a United Kingdom or Wales basis intended to combat violence against homosexuals. [605]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 20 November 1995]: The prevention and detection of crime are operational responsibilities of chief officer of police. Forces co-operate with others where circumstances indicate that to be an effective approach to reducing crime of whatever form.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Late Payment

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Lord President of the Council how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late.

Mr. Newton: Consideration is being given to the inclusion of a statement on payment practices in my Department's next annual report.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices.

Mr. Newton: The practice of the Privy Council Office is to pay all invoices within 30 days.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Charter Mark Scheme

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on British Gas's decision to withdraw from the charter mark award scheme.

Mr. Freeman: Charter mark assessors were looking into standards of service at British Gas when the company relinquished its award earlier this month. This pre-empted any recommendation the assessors might have reached as a result of their investigation into standards of service at the company.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Aid Budget

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what increases to the total overseas aid budget would be required in each of the next three years to preserve the real value of the bilateral aid programme. [1592]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) on 8 November Official Report, columns 902–903.

Overseas Aid

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of the general agreement on tariffs and trade on overseas aid to (a) sub-Saharan Africa, (b) Latin America and the Caribbean, (c) south and central Asia, (d) middle east and north Africa, (e) other Asia and Oceania and (f) eastern Europe. [1541]

Mr. Hanley: There is no direct linkage between trade liberalisation and the volume of overseas aid. However, many developing countries have taken advantage of successive general agreements on tariffs and trade to achieve export-led growth and so have reduced their need for aid.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of a shift from bilateral aid to multilateral aid on nations which receive overseas aid from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [1549]

Mr. Hanley: As the share of multilateral aid, particularly that through the EC, rises it is all the more important to work to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of multilateral aid; to focus bilateral aid on activities where the United Kingdom has a comparative advantage; and to pursue the greatest possible complementarity between both forms of aid. Action is in hand on all these points.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to change the level of expenditure on overseas aid and development. [1545]

Mr. Hanley: We shall maintain an effective and substantial programme focused on the poorest countries. Future levels of aid will be announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement on 28 November.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has had from business interests with regard to distribution of the overseas aid programme. [1539]

Mr. Hanley: None. But my noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has regular discussions with the business community about the aid programme with the twin aims of explaining developments in aid policy, and exploring with them how expenditure through the aid programme can, as a secondary objective, lead to future United Kingdom commercial relations. The question of the distribution of the aid programme is one topic occasionally referred to.

EU Development Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the matters discussed and decisions taken, indicating any votes, at the EU Development Council in Brussels on 13 November. [1556]

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Development Council on 13 November. [1204]

Mr. Hanley: The EU Development Council has been rescheduled to 20 December.

Immunisation Programmes

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of the overseas aid budget is allocated to immunisation programmes; and if this percentage will be increased over the next five years. [222]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 20 November 1995]: Immunisation against infectious diseases is one of the most cost-effective means available for improving human health. During 1994, the ODA contributed around £250 million, or at least 10 per cent. of the aid budget, directly to health and population aid. A further sum was provided indirectly, through British contributions to the European Commission, World bank and UNICEF.

Funds were used to improve the effectiveness of health services in developing countries and countries in transition; to promote improved reproductive health including safer maternity; to reduce suffering due to communicable diseases, especially tuberculosis, malaria and HIV; and to improve access to essential health care in emergencies. In all these circumstances, United Kingdom funding contributes to improved population coverage with effective vaccines. Funds are routed through the ODA's bilateral country, emergency and technology development and research programmes, grants to UNICEF and WHO, and joint funding of non-governmental organisations like Save the Children Fund, Oxfam and MERLIN.

Separate figures are not available for UK spending on immunisation work within these broader programmes.

Land Mines

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Governments of (a) Vietnam, (b) Cambodia, (c) Mozambique and (d) other developing countries regarding the results of British research into the control and destruction of land mines. [108]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 20 November 1995]: None.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what public funds have been expended on research into the control and destruction of land mines for each of the past five years. [109]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 20 November 1995]: The Ministry of defence supports a programme of generic research into battlefield engineering, part of which is directed towards studies into the control and destruction of land mines. It is estimated that expenditure on such work in this financial year will be more than £150,000. Figures for preceding years are not readily available but are understood to be comparable for the past three years and lower prior to that.

In addition, the United Kingdom participates in a number of programmes to the same purpose in NATO and in information exchanges with our allies under the technical co-operation programme.

The Overseas Development Administration has provided £104,928 to fund a short research programme by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency to review the application of various techniques for mine detection against the operational requirements of humanitarian mine clearance programmes.

ENVIRONMENT

Regional Government (North-West)

13. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about regional government in the north-west. [744]

Mr. Curry: I have received no representations on this issue.

Local Government Finance

14. Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the area cost adjustment. [745]

Mr. Curry: I have announced my proposals for an independent review of the area cost adjustment.

16. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on local government spending. [747]

Sir Paul Beresford: My right hon. Friend will be making a statement on the provisional 1996–97 local government finance settlement shortly after my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor's Budget statement.

23. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to changes to the 1995–96 capping criteria guidelines. [756]

Mr. Curry: We review the capping criteria every year. My proposals for criteria for 1996–97 will be announced with the rest of the local government finance settlement after the budget.

Out-of-town Supermarkets

15. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has as to how many out-of-town supermarkets have been opened in the past five years. [746]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department does not have information on applications granted by local planning authorities.

Housing

17. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants bought their homes under the right-to-buy legislation last year. [748]

Mr. Curry: In England, over 43,000 homes were sold under the right to buy between April 1994 and March 1995. The figure for Great Britain as a whole is more than 66,000.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will propose changes to the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 following the decision in Howson v. Buxton and in relation to persons working in association. [415]

Mr. Clappison: It is not clear how the decision in Howson v. Buxton which was decided in 1928, gives rises to an argument for change to the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954.

Single Regeneration Budget

18. Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce allocation of the single regeneration budget. [750]

Mr. Curry: My. right hon. Friend intends to announce successful bids under the second round of the single regeneration budget challenge fund by Christmas.

Local Government (Candidates)

19. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage more business men to stand as candidates for local government. [751]

Sir Paul Beresford: Our aim is to encourage people with a wide range of backgrounds, including business men, to serve as councillors. The changes which we have recently made to the councillors' allowances system are designed to achieve just this.

Biodiversity

20. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further efforts will be made to preserve biodiversity within critical habitats in Britain; and if he will make a statement. [752]

Mr. Clappison: The Government plan to submit further candidate special areas of conservation under the EC habitats directive when the results of the recent public consultation on the proposed list have been fully considered. In addition, the steering group, set up by the Government to advise on biodiversity, will publish its report on 13 December. The report will contain proposals for targets and costed action plans for key species and habitats in the United Kingdom.

Noise Controls

21. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about restricting noise. [753]

Mr. Clappison: My Department receives representations about all forms of environmental noise on a regular basis. The vast majority of this correspondence relates to neighbour noise issues.

Regional Government (West Midlands)

22. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about regional government in the west Midlands. [754]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have received no representation on this issue.

Social Housing

24. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance he will give to local authorities to build affordable social housing. [757]

Mr. Curry: Housing Associations are now the main providers of new social housing. In total, in 1995–96 around 70,000 additional new lettings are expected to be provided through a mixture of public and private funding.

National Parks

25. Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to announce the creation of any new national parks. [758]

Mr. Clappison: The Government have no plans to designate any new national parks.

Community Forests

26. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many hectares of community forest have been promised to date by local authorities; and if he will make a statement. [759]

Mr. Clappison: We have approved the business plans for 12 community forests in England. The aims of the forests are to assist economic regeneration by landscape and amenity improvements, and to provide recreation opportunities on the edges of towns and cities. Individual planting targets vary, but the overall aim is to increase tree cover in each forest to around 30 per cent. over the next 30 to 50 years. Since 1991, 2,347 hectares of woodland has been planted and over 2,000 hectares of wildlife habitat created.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the brief which his Department intends to issue to consultants advising on the privatisation of the Building Research Establishment. [314]

Sir Paul Beresford: Consultants have been invited to tender for providing advice on the relative disadvantages and advantages of the options for transferring BRE to the private sector. I have placed a copy of the specification issued to them in the Library of the House today.

Water Industry (Customer Satisfaction)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to commission any independent research into customer satisfaction with the water industry. [129]

Mr. Clappison: This is a matter for the companies and the independent regulator for the water industry, who carry out research as appropriate.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what cut-off date has been used for the collection of statistics relating to customer complaints about the water industry in the current year; [125]

(2) what categories are used to identify the subject of a customer's complaints to a water undertaker; [128]

(3) if he will list the number of (a) written and (b) telephone complaints made to each water or sewerage company in each of the five years from 1990 to 1995; and what month they are calculated from. [899]

Mr. Clappison: Information on the number of written and telephone billing complaints, and the total number of written complaints to water and sewerage companies, is published by the Office of Water Services in its annual "Report on Levels of Service for the Water Industry in England and Wales", covering the period 1 April to 31 March each year, copies of which are in the Library.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has the number of (a) written and (b) telephone complaints made to Ofwat regional committees in each of the years from 1990 to 1995. [900]

Mr. Clappison: Information on the number of complaints made to Ofwat regional customer service committees is contained in the individual annual reports of the committees and in the Office of Water Services' "Review of Companies' Complaints Procedures" of October 1995, copies of which are in the Library.

Water Supplies

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the National Rivers Authority will report to him on the adequacy of water companies' plans to safeguard water supplies next summer; and what is the minimum time required if Government intervention is necessary to protect and provide water supplies if the water companies' plans prove inadequate. [409]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked the National Rivers Authority to report to him by 15 December, following consultation with the companies, on the adequacy of water companies' plans to safeguard supplies next summer. The minimum time required to implement additional measures will depend on the nature of those measures.

Power Lines (Safety)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers regional electricity companies have to access land designated as a site of special scientific interest in order to maintain the safety of power lines. [112]

Mr. Clappison: General powers of access are set out in paragraph 7 of schedule 6 to the Electricity Act 1989.

Vehicle Emissions

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has for countering the effect of vehicle emissions in city centres and if he will make a statement. [733]

Mr. Clappison: We are on course for a significant reduction from primary road transport emissions over the next 10 years.

Nevertheless, we want to take every opportunity to press for further progress. This summer, the Environment Act 1995 set out a radical new framework for improving air quality.

Local Authority Staff

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people are estimated to be currently employed by local authorities; at what cost; what were the figures in 1979; and if he will make a statement. [1479]

Sir Paul Beresford: The total numbers of general services staff employed by local authorities in England were as follows:

Thousands

	Full-time	Part-time	Total staff
June 1979	1,469	876	2,345
June 1995	1,092	875	1,967

There have been various changes in general services employment in the period arising from changes in the functions of local government. Four major events caused significant reductions from the local authority sector:

(1) Approximately 6,300 full-time equivalents—FTEs—due to the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils in 1986.

(2) Around 14,500 full-time equivalents—FTEs—due to changes in the status of local authority bus and municipal airport staff in 1986 and 1987.

(3) Around 39,000 full-time equivalents—FTEs—when polytechnics and higher education institutions transferred from local authority control in 1989.

(4) Around 97,000 full-time equivalents—FTEs—when further education institutions became the responsibility of the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC) on 1 April 1993.

Comparable figures for the cost of local authority employment are not available because of the various changes in function of local government and because of changes in the way estimates of employment costs have been compiled. In 1994–95, the latest year for which figures are available, the total cost of wages and salaries for all local authorities, including law and order authorities, was £33 billion.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the numbers of people employed by each local authority in England in (a) 1979, (b) 1990 and (c) currently; and if he will make a statement. [358]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 20 November 1995]: The total numbers of general services staff employed by local authorities in England were as follows:

Thousands

	June 1979	June 1990	June 1995
Full time	1,469	1,327	1,091
Part time	876	955	875
Full time equivalents	1,813	1,709	[1]1,468

[1] Estimated.

There have been various changes in general services employment in the period arising from changes in the functions of local government. Four major events caused significant reductions from the local authority sector;

(1) Approximately 6,300 full-time equivalents—FTEs—due to the abolition of GLC and the metropolitan county councils in 1986.

(2) Around 14,500 full-time equivalents—FTEs—due to changes in the status of local authority bus and municipal airport staff in 1986 and 1987.

(3) Around 39,000 full-time equivalents—FTEs—when polytechnics and higher education institutions transferred from local authority control in 1989.

(4) Around 97,000 full-time equivalents—FTEs—when further education institutions became the responsibility of the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC on 1 April 1993.

Tables covering figures for individual authorities have been placed in the Library of the House.

Leaseholders' Rights

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce a right to manage for leaseholders in flats. [1482]

Mr. Curry: I am aware that proposals on a right to manage have been put forward. Important issues of principle and practicality need to be considered carefully before any decisions are taken. My officials will be discussing these shortly with interested parties.

Water Resources

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on and give his response to the conclusions of the National Rivers Authority report, "Saving Water", sent to him on 3 October. [1486]

Mr. Gummer: I welcome publication of the consultation document as a further contribution to the debate on efficient management of water resources. My Department is considering the proposals and will comment in due course.

Environmental Pollution (Central and Eastern Europe)

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of state for the Environment when he next intends to meet his EU counterparts to discuss environmental pollution in central and eastern Europe. [732]

Mr. Clappison: The next meeting of EU Ministers to discuss pollution in central and eastern Europe will be held under the Italian presidency in March 1996. The meeting will consider the follow-up to last month's Sofia conference of European Environment Ministers, in which the Secretary of State and his EU counterparts played an active part.

Housing Revenue Account Subsidy

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to issue the draft housing revenue account subsidy and item 8 determinations for 1996–97. [1896]

Mr. Curry: Local authorities have today been sent the draft housing revenue account subsidy and item 8 determinations for 1996–97 together with a consultation paper on proposed arrangements to discourage them from increasing their rents by more than the Government's guideline increase for next year. Authorities have been invited to let my Department have their views by 15 December 1995.

I am pleased to be able to say that we are proposing to freeze the average guideline rent for 1996–97, in real terms, at £34.70 a week. The increases on this year for individual authorities would range between 67p and £1.17 a week. This is good news for council tenants.

The assessment of each authority's proposed guideline rent would, for the first time, explicitly include allowance for average earnings of manual workers. Authorities' guideline rents would be based equally on local capital values and earnings. This would improve the targeting of subsidy and would ensure that the pattern of rents charged by authorities nationally better represented the income pattern of tenants. It would help us ensure that local authority rents remained affordable for those on low incomes.

We are proposing a change in the subsidy rules to encourage authorities to keep their rent increases within the guideline. Rent rebate subsidy would be limited and the limit would be linked to the guideline rent increase. Authorities which stay within this limit would be unaffected.

To provide authorities with greater certainty about their subsidy entitlement and to reduce the administrative burden both for authorities and for the Department, the proposed subsidy determination has been streamlined and the calculation of subsidy considerably simplified.

Total provision for management and maintenance costs will be £3.4 billion. The provision is slightly higher than this year per dwelling. We propose to update the distribution formula to include data from the English house condition survey and to include an allowance for social factors. About 10 per cent. of the maintenance component would be indexed to measures of social deprivation. These changes are designed to improve the allocation of subsidy so that it goes where it is needed most.

In common with the remainder of the public sector, we want to see housing departments of local town halls constantly seeking greater efficiency. Up to now, spending has continued to rise while the number of council houses has fallen, with the cost being picked up by tenants and general taxpayers. Our proposals will encourage authorities to keep their rent increases down to the Government's guideline levels and will provide a spur for them to use opportunities, such as compulsory competitive tendering, to improve efficiency, bring costs down and provide tenants with better services.

Goole

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce his decision on the future of Goole and rural Goole. [1846]

Mr. Gummer: In light of the commission's recommendation and the representations I have received, I have decided to accept the commission's recommendation that there should be no change to the boundaries of Goole and rural Goole. As a consequence, the area will form part of the new east riding of Yorkshire authority provided for in the Humberside (Structural Change) Order 1995.

Unitary Development Plans

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information (a) is available and (b) will be made available to persons concerned about major changes to unitary development plans under the provisions of the citizens charter. [111]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The free booklet, "Development Plans: What You Need to Know", published by the Department of the Environment, contains a code of practice for development plans and sets out the procedures that are to be followed by a local planning authority when it proposes to make alterations to, or replace, a unitary development plan. The Town and Country Planning Act 1990 requires the authority to place those proposals on deposit for public inspection for a period of six weeks, during which objections or representations may be made by any member of the public. Notices of the deposited proposals are required to be advertised locally and in the London Gazette. Additionally, in planning policy guidance note 12, "Development Plans and Regional Planning Guidance", the Secretary of State advises authorities to give adequate publicity at an early stage to the proposed alteration or replacement, and to give members of the public an opportunity to participate in the preparation of those proposals, prior to deposit.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Workstart Scheme

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what factors underlay the omission from guidelines sent to employment officials overseeing workstart placements of a requirement to (a) withdraw a client and (b) inform the employer immediately when a health and safety risk within the workplace is noticed; and what assessment her Department has made of the risk to workstart clients from the omission of this requirement; [978]

(2) how many of the workplaces with people on the workstart scheme have been found not to meet health and safety requirements; [976]

(3) how many of the workplaces with people on the workstart scheme have been inspected by health and safety officers; [892]

(4) what provisions she is making to ensure that unemployed people on the workstart scheme are placed in working environments which meet all health and safety requirements; [890]

(5) how many accidents have occurred involving people placed on the workstart scheme since it began. [891]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. John Heppell, dated 21 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about Health and Safety issues and the Workstart Employment Subsidy Scheme.

Workstart aims to encourage employers to take on long term unemployed people by the payment of a subsidy. Once recruited, subsidised people are employees of the employer concerned and their status is identical to that of any other employee. They are therefore covered as any other employee by health and safety legislation.

As part of the audit procedures, Workstart co-ordinators from the Employment Service (ES) visit a percentage of the firms who are in receipt of a subsidy. The purpose of this visit is for the co-ordinators to satisfy themselves that the Workstart recruit is still employed at the firm.

As the co-ordinators will be on the employers' premises, the ES sought legal advice regarding its position should they observe what appears, to a lay person, to be a health and safety problem during the course of the visit. The advice given was that the ES has no legal responsibility to identify or to act on any suspected breach of health and safety legislation. ES people undertaking Workstart visits are neither trained nor qualified to assess whether a situation is in contravention of health and safety legislation or is liable to constitute a danger. As such the monitoring visit can in no way constitute an inspection of the employer's premises. Nevertheless if the co-ordinator sees something of concern to themselves about the safety of the employer's premises they are advised to report the matter to the Health and Safety Executive. The ES has no power to 'withdraw' the employee as they are no longer employed.

The Employment Service places importance on ensuring that employers are made fully aware that agreeing to the conditions of Workstart does not negate their responsibility for health and safety issues. We therefore insist the employer signs a declaration which outlines their intent to comply with all relevant health and safety legislation when a Workstart subsidy is agreed and would not allow subsidies to be paid to employers who refused to do so.

Given that the responsibility for Health and Safety is solely that of an employer, no specific records are kept of accidents on the premises of employers in receipt of a Workstart subsidy or of visits by officials of the Health and Safety Executive to their premises.

I hope this is helpful in explaining the position.

Dance and Drama Students (Funding)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on her policy on the funding of dance and drama students. [172]

Mr. Forth: The Government are aware of the difficulties faced by some potential students of dance and drama in obtaining discretionary award support from their local authorities. We are continuing to look at whether anything might be done to help. No decisions have yet been taken.

Primary School Class Sizes

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the estimated number at January 1995 of primary school pupils educated in class sizes of 40 and above in the Dudley metropolitan borough; and what proportion this figure is of all primary children in England and Wales educated in these sized classes. [578]

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of pupils in single teacher classes of 40 or more pupils in maintained primary schools in Dudley local education authority area in January 1995, provisional, was 1,027. This represented 5.6 per cent. of pupils in single teacher classes of 40 or more pupils in maintained primary schools in England.

Information on classes in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Information Technology

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to ensure that teachers are properly trained in the use of information technology. [18]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government's criteria for initial teacher training require that newly qualified teachers should be able to make effective use of information technology as a learning resource. The Teacher Training Agency has identified support for teachers using information technology as one of the national priorities to be addressed through its action programme for continuing professional development.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many times in the last year she has used (a) London Transport buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [421]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have not used either London Buses or London Underground on official business, although I often walk.

Jobclub

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list by area (a) the percentage of unemployed persons who attend a jobclub and (b) the percentage of those who attended who were successful in finding full-time work. [184]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 21 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about Jobclubs.

The information is not available in the form requested.

I am, however able to provide details of the number of people who joined the Jobclub during 1994/95 by Employment Service Region, together with the total average number of unemployed people during the same period. The proportion of Jobclub leavers who took up any job is also shown.

I hope this is helpful.

Numbers of unemployed and jobclub performance April 1994–March 1995

	Average number of unemployed claimants in year	Total number of jobclub entrants in year	Percentage of those leaving jobclub entering work

Remploy

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if she will list the major companies to which Remploy supplies its products; [1027]

(2) what Government funding will be provided to Remploy during the period April 1995 to April 1996. [1026]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 21 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about the major companies to which Remploy supplies its products and about Government funding for Remploy in 1995/96.

I am unable to list Remploy's major customers as this information is commercial in confidence to the Company. During the period 1 April 1995 to 31 March 1996 Remploy will receive Government funding of £94.161 million.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to contract out Remploy to the private sector. [1025]

Mr. Forth: We have none.

Literacy and Numeracy

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to increase literacy and numeracy among school age children. [17]

Mrs. Gillan: Raising standards of literacy and numeracy is at the heart of our school reforms, notably the national curriculum, regular testing, performance tables, regular inspection and improvements to teacher training. The chief inspector of schools has confirmed that our reforms are improving the quality of education.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many allegations of fraudulent claims she has investigated under the assisted places scheme, due to claimants understating their incomes. [21]

Mrs. Gillan: It is for participating schools, in the first instance, to investigate any claims by parents seeking help under the assisted places scheme which schools have reason to believe may have been made fraudulently. The Education (Assisted Places) Regulations 1995 provide that, if the parents of an assisted pupil do not duly furnish the school with supporting documentary evidence, or if they knowingly or recklessly furnish false information, they shall not be entitled to any remission of fees for that year.

Undergraduates

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate she has made of the drop-out rate of undergraduates as a direct result of financial hardship. [180]

Mr. Forth: Our latest estimate of the drop-out rate of students from full-time and sandwich first-degree courses is 17 per cent. in the academic year 1992–93. This covers all those leaving because of exam failure, ill health, personal and other reasons including financial difficulties. It is not possible to identify the drop-out rate caused by financial difficulties alone, but recent research in one university suggests that financial difficulties are less likely to be the cause than personal reasons or students' coming to the view that their course is unsuitable.

Teacher-pupil Ratios (Durham)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the teacher-pupil ratio in Durham local education authority in 1989–90 and the latest year for which figures are available. [183]

Mr. Robin Squire: The overall pupil-teacher ratios in Durham local education authority in January 1990 and 1995, provisional, were 18:3 and 19:1 respectively.

University Professors

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received regarding the posts of recently appointed university professors and their remuneration; and if she will make a statement. [382]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations. As autonomous institutions, universities are free to determine the appointments of professorial staff and their remuneration. The nationally agreed minimum salary for professors from 1 April 1995 is £31,999.

Apprentices (Manufacturing Industry)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total number of apprentices in manufacturing industry for each year since 1979. [454]

Mr. Paice: The information requested is given in the table. Estimates for years prior to 1984 are not available.

Number of people doing an apprenticeship in manufacturing industry 1984–95

Note:
[1] A revised Standard Industrial Classification was adopted in 1993. Estimates on the new basis are not directly comparable with those for earlier years.

Labour Force Survey, spring of each year.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions she has had over the last year with trade unions on the subject of apprenticeships in the manufacturing industry; and if she will make a statement. [452]

Mr. Paice: We have had no personal discussions with trade unions on this subject. Industry training organisations have involved manufacturing sectors' trade unions widely in discussions about the development of modern apprenticeship frameworks.

Higher Education

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she expects to complete her review of the funding models of future higher education and to be able to make an announcement. [1417]

Mr. Forth: The Government's review of higher education is looking at wider issues than funding models. We recognise the importance of higher education to the country's future economy and society, and do not intend to rush the review by setting arbitrary deadlines.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the first special educational needs tribunal was held; how many appeals have been heard; how many are outstanding; and what is the average waiting time from an appeal being received to a tribunal being held. [1060]

Mr. Forth: The Department does not maintain detailed records about appeals to the special educational needs tribunal, which is an independent non-departmental public body. I have therefore asked the president of the tribunal, Mr. Trevor Aldridge QC, to write to the hon. Member.

Information about the numbers of appeals to the tribunal will be available in the president's annual report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, which will be placed in the Library when it is published.

Social Chapter

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what legislation has been agreed by the European Union arising from the social chapter of the Single European Act treaty or the work programme arising from the social charter agreed in Strasbourg by the European Council in 1989, which by virtue of the protocol on social policy in the treaty on European Union does not apply to the United Kingdom; what articles authorised such legislation; and what proposals in or likely to be in this category of legislation are before either the Council of Ministers or the Council of Permanent Representatives. [1481]

Mr. Forth: One directive, on European works councils, has been adopted by the other European Community member states under article 2.2 of their agreement on social policy. Three other dossiers, covering parental leave, part-time and temporary work and reversal of the burden of proof in sex discrimination cases, are currently being considered under the agreement and may result in further legislative measures.

Welfare and Counselling (Students)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps her Department have taken to improve the welfare and counselling services to students in the last five years; and if she will make a statement. [1206]

Mr. Forth: None. Colleges and universities are independent, autonomous bodies, responsible for managing their own affairs. Any arrangements that institutions make for the welfare and counselling of their students are for the governing body of each institution to determine; Ministers have no powers to intervene.

Mr. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research has been undertaken in the last five years by her Department into the level of students suffering from stress and depression; and if she will make a statement. [1212]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has undertaken no such research in the last five years.

Student Grants

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the average grant received by students in (a) 1991, (b) 1992, (c) 1993 and (d) 1994; and if she will make a statement. [1213]

Mr. Forth: The average net maintenance grants after means testing received by mandatory award holders in England and Wales in the academic years 1990–91 to 1993–94 are set out in the table. Since 1990–91, eligible students have also had access to non-means-tested student loans.

Average net maintenance grants to holders of mandatory awards

Academic year	Average net maintenance grant paid by local education authorities[1]
England and Wales
1990–91	1,480
1991–92	1,540
1992–93	1,610
1993–94	1,670

[1] To the nearest £10.

Hardship Funds

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students applied for hardship funds in (a) 1991, (b) 1992, (c) 1993 and (d) 1994; and if she will make a statement. [1216]

Mr. Forth: The purpose of the hardship funds, correctly known as the access funds, is to provide financial help to students whose access to further or higher education might be inhibited by financial considerations or who, for whatever reason, including physical or other disabilities, face financial difficulties.

From the information provided by institutions, it is estimated that the numbers of applications for further and higher education access funds are as follows:

Academic year	Further education	Higher education
1990–91	22,100	116,000[1]
1991–92	30,000	118,200[1]
1992–93	32,400	67,440
1993–94	Not available	77,060
1994–95	Not available	Will be available later in the year

[1] Figures relate to the UK; other figures are not for England only.

Figures for further education access funds may exclude some students at colleges who failed to submit returns.

Student Loans

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many students applied for student loans in (a) 1991, (b) 1992, (c) 1993 and (d) 1994; and if she will make a statement; [1215]

(2) how many students who graduated in (a) 1989, (b) 1990, (c) 1991, (d) 1992, (e) 1993 and (f) 1994 are still in debt to the Student Loans Company; and if she will make a statement. [1214]

Mr. Forth: These are matters for the Student Loans Company. I have asked the acting chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has for the continuation of ethnic monitoring of school pupils following the consultation exercise earlier this year. [1975]

Mrs. Gillan: Our consultations of future arrangements for ethnic monitoring of school pupils produced a clear consensus for improving the usefulness of monitoring while reducing the burden on schools. We have therefore decided to cease the existing separate ethnic monitoring surveys and introduce instead a combination of approaches. First, the 1996 schools census will include simple new questions about the ethnic backgrounds of pupils. The three new questions will cover: the total number of ethnic minority pupils in each school; the names of the largest groups; and the total number of pupils for whom English is a second language. More detailed questions will be developed for inclusion in the 1997 schools census. Secondly, Ofsted will monitor the progress of ethnic minority pupils in individual schools, as part of its regular inspection process. Thirdly, research will be undertaken where necessary to investigate particular issues in depth. Details of the new arrangements were sent to local authorities and schools in September.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Attorney-General what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [934]

The Attorney-General: The information available for the Law Officers' Departments is as follows:

Over recent sample periods the average time between receipt of a valid invoice and payment was 17 days for the Serious Fraud Office, and 35 days for the Treasury Solicitor's Department. The Government Property Lawyers process all claims within five days.

The Crown Prosecution Service pays over 80 per cent. of witness expense claims within 10 working days.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Attorney-General how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [951]

The Attorney-General: The Departments for which I am responsible make every effort to settle invoices promptly and in accordance with the requirements published in Government Accounting. Information about those Department's payment practices is published in the annual departmental report of the Lord Chancellor's and Law Officer's Departments.

In addition, the performance of the Crown Prosecution Service against its target of paying claims for witness expenses within 10 working days is published in its statutory annual report.

Invitations to tender issued by the Treasury Solicitor's Department also contain a reference to the effect that payment will be made within 30 days of receipt of a valid invoice.

The Government Property Lawyers publish details of payment policy in the annual report and accounts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [961]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Department's general conditions of contract contain a clause informing suppliers that we shall make a payment within agreed terms, or within 30 days of receipt of an invoice, where no such terms exist. The conditions also give advice on how to complain if the Department fails to make payment on time. Annual surveys of invoice payments are carried out, the latest of which showed that 93.9 per cent. of invoices were paid on time. A further survey is being carried out of invoices authorised for payment during the month of November. The survey results, together with details of the Department's payment policies, are published in the Department's annual report.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [927]

Mr. Taylor: The information required to answer the question is not recorded centrally. An examination of the procedures for paying invoices throughout the Department has shown that, on average, invoices are paid within seven days of receipt.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many officials of his Department are part-time involved in legal matters relating to the destruction of the airliner Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie. [1630]

Mr. John M. Taylor: None.

Antarctic Minerals

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reasons the Antarctic Minerals Act 1989 has not fully been brought into force; and when he intends to fully bring it into force. [196]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I have been asked to reply.

The Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities (CRAMRA) has, in effect, been superseded by the 1991 environmental protocol to the Antarctic treaty. Provisions to enable the United Kingdom to ratify the protocol were included in Antarctic Act 1994. The Act also repealed the Antarctic Minerals Act 1989, except for provisions relating only to the administration of justice for the British Antarctic Territory.

TREASURY

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days of receipt or in accordance with contractual agreements in each of the last five years. [1117]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Records of the promptness of payment for the past five years are not maintained. Over the past three years, the amount owed to businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days of receipt was:

1993–94: £1,006K

1995–96 to date: £818K

The majority of the invoices to which the sums above relate were delayed due to problems associated with the particular suppliers such as an error in the invoice or failure to deliver the goods or service.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (i) orders and (ii) firms are represented by the 18 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; how many of those are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [912]

Mrs. Knight: The number of (i) orders and (ii) firms represented by the 18 per cent. of invoices not paid within 30 days is shown in the table:

(i) orders: 380

(ii) firms: 152

These figures include invoices which were delayed due to problems associated with the particular suppliers such as an error in the invoice or failure to deliver the goods or service.

The Treasury does not distinguish between different sizes of suppliers. Information on how many of those invoices relate to firms with fewer than 500 employees is not available.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [919]

Mrs. Knight: The average number of days taken to pay invoices is 23 days from date of receipt.

This includes invoices which were delayed due to problems associated with the particular suppliers such as an error in the invoice or failure to deliver the goods or service.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [969]

Mrs. Knight: Departmental payment performance figures are published annually within the Chancellor of the Exchequer's departmental report. Figures are given showing the percentage of invoices paid within 30 days of receipt of an invoice or within the payment period specified in a contract if different.

Alcohol and Tobacco (Cross-border Trade)

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present estimated annual value of revenue lost to the Exchequer because of illicit cross-border trade in alcoholic and tobacco products. [80]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: By its nature, the scale of illicit cross-border trade in alcohol and tobacco is very difficult to assess. Reliable figures are not available. Officials are working closely with United Kingdom trade representatives to determine whether a satisfactory method of estimating the value of this trade can be developed.

European Monetary Institute

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) who represents Britain on the European Monetary Institute; whose policy they articulate; whom they report to; and what is their brief in respect of monetary union; [1101]

(2) who represents Britain in the European Monetary Institute; and which body determines United Kingdom policy in respect of the institute. [545]

Mrs. Angela Knight: In accordance with the terms of article 109f of the EC Treaty, and article 1 of the protocol on the statute of the European Monetary Institute annexed to the treaty, the Bank of England is a member of the EMI, and the Governor of the Bank of England is a member of the EMI's council. Active participation by the Governor on the council of the EMI is in accordance with the Government's policy of full involvement in preparations for economic and monetary union, which the Government believe is necessary to protect our interest whether or not the UK participates in the single currency.

Monetary Union

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what obligations are imposed on the United Kingdom and what changes have to be made to British economic policy to allow the United Kingdom to qualify for monetary union and to take Her Majesty's Government to the point at which it can decide to enter monetary union or not. [1106]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Council, meeting in the composition of Heads of State and Government, will decide for each member state whether it fulfils the necessary conditions for the adoption of a single currency, in accordance with the provisions of article 109j of the EC treaty and protocol No. 6 on the convergence criteria. Protocol No. 11, annexed to the EC treaty, means that the United Kingdom shall not be obliged or committed to move to the third stage of economic union without a separate decision to do so by the Government and Parliament. We will agree to take part in a single currency only if it is in our national interest to do so, given the circumstances at the time. The Government's economic policies aim to bear down on inflation and ensure sound public finances. These policies make good economic sense and are entirely consistent with the convergence criteria.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on Treasury revenue in 1996–97 and in a full year of extending value added tax at (a) 8 per cent. and (b) 17.5 per cent. to all those zero-rated, giving figures separately for each item. [91]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Table 10 of the Treasury publication "Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs" shows the estimated cost of not applying standard rate VAT to those items currently zero-rated. Those figures make no allowance for changes in consumer behaviour. It is possible to derive estimates for revenue from 8 per cent. VAT from those figures. The latest figures available are for 1995–96.

£ million

	8.0 per cent.	17.5 per cent.
Food	3,450	7,550
Construction of new dwellings	820	1,800
Domestic passenger transport	620	1,350
International passenger transport	530	1,150
Books, newspapers and magazines	550	1,200
Childrens clothes and shoes	340	750
Water and sewerage services	410	900

£ million

	8.0 per cent.	17.5 per cent.
Drugs and medicines on prescription	300	650
Supplies to charities	90	200
Ships and aircraft above a certain size	210	450
Vehicles and other supplies to disabled people	70	150

Ordtech Trials

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total cost to the public funds of the Ordtech trials. [1023]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is not possible at this stage to give a total cost to the public funds of the Ordtech trials. Legal fees paid to date by HM Customs and Excise, as prosecuting authority, amount to £175,808.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Sri Lanka

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to provide humanitarian assistance to displaced people and refugees from the Jaffna area of Sri Lanka. [566]

Mr. Hanley: Earlier this month, we provided two emergency aid grants of £250,000 and £100,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross and Christian Action, Research and Education respectively, to help alleviate the suffering of those affected by the recent fighting. We also provide on-going support, through Save the Children and Oxfam, for relief and rehabilitation programmes which help displaced families. In 1995–96, we expect to spend around £1.2 million on these programmes.

Aid Programme

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what (a) percentage and (b) amount of the annual expenditure for overseas aid is channelled through non-governmental organisations (i) in developing countries overall, (ii) in each country and (iii) on each project. [1546]

Mr. Hanley: In 1994–95 total expenditure for overseas aid to developing countries was £2.018 billion. Of this, £1.048 billion was in the form of bilateral aid, of which 16.5 per cent. or £173 million was channelled through non-governmental organisations. More detailed breakdowns of this expenditure by individual countries and projects are not available and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

ENVIRONMENT

Insulation

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many voucher booklets offering discounts on home insulation products were recently distributed; which body was responsible for producing them; to whom they were distributed; and at what cost; [600]

(2) how many inquiries about cavity wall insulation were generated because of the television advertising campaign that formed part of the energy efficiency scheme promoted by his Department; [601]

(3) which body was responsible for the promotion of the cavity wall insulation scheme with which his Department was involved as part of the energy efficiency scheme; and how the body responsible for the promotion was chosen; [602]

(4) what was the cost to public funds of the recent television campaign promoting cavity wall insulation under the energy efficiency scheme. [603]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The voucher booklets were produced by the Department of the Environment with the aim of increasing the take-up of energy efficiency measures through offers provided by private sector companies and trade associations at their own expense. Cavity wall insulation was only one of 14 different products and services included in the booklet. The voucher book as a whole was supported by television advertising costing £1,232,313.

Over 5 million voucher books have been distributed direct to owner-occupied older properties which are likely to be able to benefit from the full range of offers included. Distribution costs were £58,750. The voucher books can also be obtained from local energy advice centres and by using press advertisement coupons.

The cavity wall insulation offer is nominally promoted by InstaGroup, but covers four major fibre-based cavity insulation system designers, the National Cavity Insulation Association and the Cavity Insulation Guarantee Agency. InstaGroup's role as promoter came as a result of agreement among all the participants. All the vouchers are valid at least until the end of the year, and longer in some cases. It is therefore too early to assess the results.

Housing

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies or research are being undertaken into the particular care and support requirements in housing of the elderly living in rural areas. [207]

Mr. Curry: In 1995, my Department commissioned research into the nature of demand for housing in rural areas including the housing needs of elderly people. A final report is due in July 1996.

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy in respect of local initiatives which provide care and support services, including specialist retirement housing, to meet the needs of elderly home owners in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [206]

Mr. Curry: The Government's policy is that care should be provided to people as far as possible in their existing housing where this is their preference and it is cost effective to do so. This policy is supported by the availability of home renovation grants and the work of home improvement agencies.

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the impact of the introduction of stress area enhancement on the number of new homes built in (a) the south-west and (b) Great Britain. [593]

Mr. Clappison: The purpose of stress area enhancement is to channel additional housing resources to those local authority areas with the greatest social, environmental housing problems. Any effect on the number of new homes built is marginal, and the specific information requested is not available.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library copies of the housing investment programme bids made by each housing authority in England; and if he will summarise the total lists from each region. [975]

Mr. Curry: Copies of local authorities' HIP bids for 1996–97 along with strategy statements and associated HIP forms are being collated and will be placed in the Library shortly. Regional summaries of the bids will be placed in the Library when all the bid data have been verified.

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he now intends to take to improve standards in houses in multiple occupation. [2214]

Mr. Curry: I am proposing a package of measures which will be able to deal with the problems in this sector of the housing market in a more cost-effective and flexible way than a national mandatory licensing scheme. I intend, therefore, to bring forward legislation as soon as possible.

There are four principal elements to this legislative package. First, there will be general duty of care placed on HMO landlords with respect to amenity and fire safety standards. Breach of this duty will be a criminal offence punishable by a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale—£5,000. Guidance on the duty will be set out in a national code of practice which will be issued before the new duty is brought into force.

Secondly, local authorities will be able to introduce a modified form of HMO registration scheme. This will exclude smaller HMOs—those with only two households or with one household and no more than four other occupants—and houses converted entirely into self-contained flats. The registration schemes will contain powers enabling local authorities to refuse to register all properties where conditions are substandard or where management is inadequate. Re-registration will be required after five years and there will be higher fees chargeable to landlords for registration and new re-registration fees at a lower rate. These fees will help local authorities to resource an enhanced programme of enforcement activity.

Thirdly, I also propose to extend local authorities' existing mandatory duty to ensure that there are adequate fire safety precautions in larger HMOs. This duty will be introduced by statutory instrument and there will be further consultation on its scope, but I am minded to apply it to all HMOs which could come within the scope of the new form of registration scheme providing these properties have three storeys or more. I also propose exemptions for specific public sector landlords, but these HMO landlords will of course still be subject to the new duty of care.

Finally, I shall be introducing some important deregulatory measures by making an order under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 to modify some of the local authority HMO enforcement procedures. For the principal HMO enforcement notices, local authorities will be required first to serve a notice informing landlords that they are minded to take action, but this procedure can be dispensed with in emergencies. Where a formal enforcement notice is still required, I propose that local authorities will have power to recover the costs of their enforcement action from the landlord, subject to a maximum amount.

Local authorities will be required to consult the fire authorities mainly about the exercise of their statutory duty to check fire safety in HMOs, but will no longer have to consult them about HMO enforcement notices served in other circumstances. In addition to this substantial package of new provisions, and as stated in the consultation paper, the new planning controls on the switch from hotel to hostel use will remain in force.

I share the widespread concern that the rapid expansion of hostels in a number of popular resort areas is causing very serious problems. As these new HMO controls begin to take effect, however, we should see a great improvement in these areas—providing that the local authorities concerned pursue a vigorous programme of enforcement action using their new powers.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if the White Paper "Our Future Homes" (CM 2901) was (a) subject to, and (b) modified on account of an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment" produced by his Department; and if he will publish the appraisal; [303]

(2) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in the White Paper "Our Future Homes" (Cm 2901) were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department; [304]

(3) what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the impacts arising from his implementation of the White paper "Our Future Homes" (Cm 2901). [305]

Mr. Curry: The housing White Paper "Our Future Homes" sets out the Government's aim of meeting demand for housing in an environmentally sustainable way, using our resources effectively, building where possible on existing urban land rather than greenfield sites and reducing the number of empty homes. Environmental considerations have been, and continue to be, an integral part of policy development. They have for instance played a large part in decisions made to:

promote energy efficiency in new and existing homes of all tenures; set a target that half of all new homes should be built on re-used sites; test the use of EMAS—the EC Eco-Management and Audit Scheme—in the field of housing association policy and programmes.

The effectiveness of housing policies, including environmental and sustainable development considerations, is reviewed continually.

General Needs Index

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what factors underlay the removal of (a) homelessness and (b) temporary accommodation from the general needs index. [592]

Mr. Clappison: We decided to remove those indicators because they do not provide a good measure of the need for investment in social housing. Homelessness figures say much more about the flow of people into existing social rented housing than about the need to build new homes; they are very volatile and their use in allocating capital resources can cause disruption to capital programmes; and they reflect different administrative practice in different local authorities.

Boulsbury Wood

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public money he estimates will be spent in total to prevent the destruction of Boulsbury wood: who will receive most of the money; and what assessment he has made of the value for money of such expenditure. [374]

Mr. Clappison: A management agreement is a commercial arrangement between the nature conservation bodies and the recipient. The financial guidelines make it clear that details of such arrangements cannot be released. The National Audit Office report "Protecting and Managing SSSIs" concluded that agreements reached with English Nature complied with the financial guidelines.

Leaseholders

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many leaseholders in flats have to date been able to acquire the freehold of their homes under the provisions of part I of the Leasehold Reform Housing and Urban Development Act 1993. [312]

Mr. Curry: It is not possible to obtain comprehensive information on how many leaseholders in flats have been able to acquire the freehold of their homes, as enfranchisement is a private transaction between the freeholder and leaseholders.

Housing (Dudley)

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new housing units were constructed by (a) the local authority and (b) housing associations in Dudley metropolitan borough area in each year since 1979. [580]

Mr. Clappison: Local authorities' primary housing tasks are now the efficient management of their own stock of housing and enabling other organisations to provide new housing. Housing associations are now the main providers of new social housing.

The publications "Housebuilding in England by Local Authority Area: 1980 to 1989" and "Local Housing Statistics" show estimates of housebuilding completions for each local authority area in England, including the Dudley metropolitan borough area. They show completions by sector, including activity by local authorities and housing associations.

"Housebuilding in England by Local Authority Area: 1980 to 1989" shows figures for the period 1980 to 1984. "Local Housing Statistics" shows figures for 1979 and later years: issue 59 covers 1979; No. 103 covers the years 1985 to 1990; No. 105 covers 1991: No. 106 covers 1992; No. 110 covers 1993; and No. 114 covers 1994.

Copies of these publications are in the Library.

Clean Air Act 1993

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to amend provisions contained in the Clean Air Act 1993. [130]

Mr. Clappison: As announced in "Cutting Red Tape", published in January 1994, the Government intend to repeal sections 4 to 13 of the Clean Air Act 1993—formerly contained in the Clean Air Acts 1956 and 1968. They are no longer necessary in the light of changes in fuel use and the provisions of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Uranium, Caldecott

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the source of the uranium found on Poplar farm, Caldecott, Northamptonshire. [336]

Mr. Clappison: I have nothing further to add at this stage, to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on 27 October 1995, Official Report, column 817.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public money was spent on cleaning up contaminated land on inner-city development sites during 1994–95. [310]

Mr. Clappison: Public expenditure support for the redevelopment of inner-city and other sites—including, where necessary, the costs of dealing with contaminated soil—is made available under a number of different programmes. In England, these included in 1994–95 English Partnerships' investment fund, city challenge and urban programme; parallel arrangements exist in Wales and Scotland.

Funding to meet the costs of land remediation typically constitutes only one element of a wider package of support for individual projects under these programmes. The various different cost elements are not separately identified in centrally collected records, and it is therefore not possible to provide a detailed breakdown in the form requested.

Work-related Upper Limb Disorders

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many employees in (a) the public sector and (b) the private sector, have been diagnosed with work-related upper limb disorders during the years (i) 1992–93, (ii) 1993–94 and (iii) 1994–95. [1126]

Sir Paul Beresford: Some types of work-related upper limb disorders are prescribed under the industrial injuries scheme. The number of cases in Great Britain diagnosed with at least 1 per cent. disability for the periods 1992–93 and 1993–94 are shown in the table:

Disorders	1992–93	[1]1993–94
Cramp of hand or forearm	116	135
Beat hand	16	18
Beat elbow	38	42
Inflammation of tendons of the hand, forearm or associated tendon sheaths (Tenosynovitis)	911	800
Carpal Tunnel Syndrome	20	267

Data broken down by private and public sectors are not collated in the form requested, and data for 1994–95 are not yet available.

The industrial injuries statistics cover only the most serious cases from a restricted range of occupationally defined upper limb disorders. From a survey based on respondents' own perception of the link between their occupation and ill-health, it was estimated that in the 12 months prior to March 1990, 110,000 people in England and Wales suffered from an upper limb disorder which they believed was caused by their work. This estimate was based on responses to a special set of questions in the 1990 labour force survey and covers a wider range of upper limb disorders and degrees of severity than the industrial injuries scheme.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many employers have complied with the Health and Safety (Display Screen Equipment) Regulations 1992 in respect of the instructions to employers to (a) analyse VDU workstations, (b) assess the risks to health and (c) take action to reduce such risks; and how many employers have been prosecuted for not complying with the regulations. [1005]

Sir Paul Beresford: Information on the extent of compliance with the Health and Safety (Display Screen Equipment) Regulations 1992 is not available in the form requested. However, the Health and Safety Executive has started work to evaluate the impact of the regulations. This has included a survey of employers. This evaluation is due for completion in 1996 and should produce information on the extent of awareness of, and compliance with, the regulations, and what actions employers have taken to comply.

The available figures for 1993–94 and 1994–95, provisional figures show that HSE's field operations division inspectors took no prosecution action under the display screen equipment regulations, but issued five improvement notices under these regulations. Equivalent figures are not available for local authority inspectors, who enforce health and safety regulations in premises such as offices, banks and shops.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1423]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State for the Environment has not in the last five years produced or authorised the production of any public interest immunity certificates in any legal proceedings.

Green Ministers

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what assessment he has made of the advantages of having (a) a junior minister and (b) a Secretary of State as a Green Minister; [242]

(2) if he will publish the criteria used to select the Minister to be designated as the Green Minister within a Government Department; [240]

(3) who is responsible for selecting the Green Minister within each Government Department. [241]

Mr. Gummer: Green Ministers are appointed by the senior Minister for each Department who will look for whoever may best fulfill the role and combine it with other duties. There are no fixed criteria, and the appropriate level in the team may vary. The responsibility of the Green Minister in each Department is to ensure that environmental considerations are integrated into the strategy and policies of that Department.

Regional Planning Guidance (West Midlands)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of regional planning guidance for the west midlands. [252]

(2) if regional planning guidance for the west midlands was (a) subject to and (b) modified on account of an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment" produced by the Department of the Environment; and if he will publish the appraisal; [250]

(3) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in regional planning guidance for the west midlands were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department. [251]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The regional planning guidance followed the principles set out in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment". During its three-year development, a number of alternative courses of action were considered and environmentally appraised. The west midlands local authorities held a conference at which a wide range of organisations expressed their views on a series of strategic planning options for the region. The authorities then submitted their advice to my Department and there was a period of consultation on that advice. My Department published draft regional planning guidance and again a period was allowed for consultation. The final guidance included numerous modifications to the original advice reflecting the view expressed by environmental organisations and others. I do not intend to publish a separate environmental appraisal in addition to the material already published.

We have asked the west midlands local authorities to keep the guidance under regular review in partnership with the Government office for the west midlands and others. Follow-up studies are required on particular aspects. The authorities' attention is particularly drawn to the aim of achieving a more sustainable pattern of development in the region.

Invoices

Mrs. Barbara Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices; [932]

(2) how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late; [956]

(3) what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days or within the agreed contractual arrangements in each of the last five years. [1119]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department only holds central data on its performance in paying invoices within 30 days or the agreed credit period where this is different. It does not hold a central record of the amount owed to businesses not paid within the agreed period. This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The Department's payment practices are publicised in its terms and conditions of contract and its annual report.

Water Conservation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in "Water Conservation: Government Action" were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department; [248]

(2) if "Water Conservation: Government Action" was (a) subject to, and (b) modified on account of, an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment" produced by his Department; and if he will publish the appraisal; [247]

(3) what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of "Water Conservation: Government Action". [249]

Mr. Clappison: "Policy Appraisal and the Environment" sets out an approach whereby environmental effects can be taken into account in policy development, while recognising that this will vary from case to case depending on the complexity and significance of the impacts. "Water Conservation: Government Action" outlines the Government's policy for England and Wales on the various issues surrounding the conservation of water resources, including the proposed approach to the future method of charging for water. The Government's position is that, before additional resources are developed, existing resources should be used as far as possible, taking into account economic and environmental consideration.

The general policy and the specific proposals were developed following widespread consultation. They are designed to reduce the potential environmental impact of increased demand for water by measures to promote its efficient distribution and use.

The effectiveness of the policy and the specific proposals will be monitored by the Department of the Environment, the Office of Water Services and the National Rivers Authority.

Rural Policy

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if the White Paper "Rural England" (Cm 3016) was (a) subject to, and (b) modified on account of an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment" produced by his Department; and if he will publish the appraisal; [300]

(2) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in the White Paper "Rural England" (Cm 3016) were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department; [301]

(3) what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of the White Paper "Rural England" (Cm 3016). [302]

Mr. Clappison: The rural White Paper "Rural England" sets out the Government's vision for the future of the countryside, looking at economic, social and environmental issues together. The White Paper was formulated in line with the Government's commitment to sustainable development.

Environmental considerations are an essential element of policy considerations and will be taken into account in following up the commitments contained within the White Paper.

Regional Staff

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff his Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region; what is the cost of running these regional operations; what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [266]

Sir Paul Beresford: Detailed information on Department of Environment staff employed in the Government offices for the regions, their budgets and activities is provided in GO-MINIS 1, copies of which were placed in the Library in July 1995.

Biological Diversity

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the achievement of the meeting, referred to in his answer of 8 November 1995, Official Report, column 995, of the convention on biological diversity in Jakarta, 6 to 17 November in regard to the transfer of living modified organisms between countries. [1631]

Mr. Clappison: The second conference of the parties to the convention on biological diversity, held in Jakarta, Indonesia from 6 to 17 November 1995, decided to set in hand the development of a biosafety protocol which will specifically focus on the transboundary movement of living modified organisms. The conference also recognised the importance of the United Nations environment programme international technical guidelines on safety in biotechnology as a possible interim measure during the development of the protocol and as a complement to it after its completion.

Other important decisions included the acknowledgement of the importance of parties establishing national strategies and in-situ conservation measures, the establishment of a three-year scientific work programme on coastal and marine ecosystems, the establishment of a pilot phase of the clearing house mechanism to facilitate the sharing of information and the choice of Montreal as the location for the biodiversity convention secretariat.

As last year, it was not possible to reach agreement on voting provisions on financial issues. These will be considered again at the third conference of the parties to be held in November 1996.

Environmental Technology Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was (a) the total output and (b) the percentage of GNP of the United Kingdom environmental industry for each year since 1990–91; and if he will provide an estimate for the current financial year; [1163]

(2) what assessment he has made of the growth in the last five years of the United Kingdom environmental technology industry in terms of (a) output, (b) percentage of GNP and (c) employment; [1165]

(3) how many people in the United Kingdom are employed in the environmental technology industry; and how many people have been employed in that industry for each year since 1990. [1164]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

Information on the environmental technology and associated industries is very limited. Using a definition of the environmental products industries as producing information available suggests that the value added by the environmental products sector has increased strongly over the period from 1985 to 1991. In 1990 and 1991, there were approximately 110,000 people employed in the environmental products industries.

"a product which enhances or prevents the deterioration of the external environment"

The available information on this topic, which was derived by the Department's statisticians, has been published in "Statistical News; Summer 1995" and is available in the Library of the House. No further assessment has yet been made on the growth of this sector.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times in the last year he used (a) the London Underground and (b) London Transport buses while on official business. [372]

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary uses public transport from time to time.

Hydronuclear Experimental Tests

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of whether hydronuclear experimental tests may be conducted within the terms of the proposed comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty. [1587]

Mr. David Davis: We are working to achieve a comprehensive test ban treaty which would prohibit all nuclear weapon tests explosions involving any release of nuclear energy.

Iraq

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the number of prisoners from other nations currently being detained in Iraq and their countries of origin. [1588]

Mr. Hanley: We have no reliable figures on the total number of foreigners held in Iraqi gaols.

Precise numbers of foreign prisoners are not given out by the Iraqi regime.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what communication he has had with Hussein Kamil in respect of Iraqi compliance with Security Council resolutions involving disclosure of information on prisoners of war. [1590]

Mr. Hanley: It would not be appropriate to comment on this matter. We continue to press the Iraqi authorities through every available means to disclose the fate of the detainees.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Iraqi Government concerning Kuwaiti prisoners of war still being held captive; and if he will make a statement. [1589]

Mr. Hanley: We take every opportunity at the UN and through the tripartite commission to press Iraq to co-operate. The November review of sanctions stressed that Iraq must comply with all its UN obligations including that on Kuwaiti detainees.

Exports

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is the practice of his Department to make an assessment of the loss of earnings by British exporters, excluding military equipment, which may be caused as a result of war or internal conflict. [1571]

Mr. David Davis: This Department, together with the Department of Trade and Industry, alerts British exporters to potential difficulties in repatriation of export earnings that may occur as a result of war or internal conflicts abroad. Further action is then a matter for the individual companies. We have no central figures for the total amount involved in loss of earnings as the result of such actions.

Caroline Beale

Mr. Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the relevant United States authorities to ensure that the legal proceedings concerning Caroline Beale, or any decision on her future, are not unduly delayed; and if he will make a statement. [1150]

Mr. Hanley: Her Majesty's consul has pressed both the New York district attorney's office and the defence counsel for a decision in this case on many occasions, most recently on 13 November.

Land Mines

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the criteria which will be used to determine non-detectable anti-personnel land mines. [1570]

Mr. David Davis: We are working to incorporate stringent specifications on the detectability of anti-personnel land mines into the 1981 United Nations weaponry convention. Specifically, we support a proposal from the International Committee of the Red Cross to the effect that:

"Anti-personnel mines shall incorporate in their construction, or have attached, in a manner not easily removable, material or a device that enables the mine to be detected by commonly available technical mine detection equipment and provides a response signal equivalent to a signal from 8 grams, or more, of iron in a single coherent mass".

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many orders and firms are represented by the 13 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of those related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [1116]

Mr. Hanley: The 13 per cent. of payments not made by the Overseas Development Administration in 1994–95 within 30 days of receipt of a valid invoice or in accordance with contractual arrangements amounted to 3,328 payments out of a total number of 25,234. Separate figures for small firms are not available.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [957]

Mr. Hanley: The FCO, Diplomatic Wing and Overseas Development Administration, publishes payment performance, as a percentage of invoices paid on time, in the annual departmental report. The FCO, DW and ODA, is committed to the CBI prompt payment code, which includes a clause to the effect that properly supported invoices will be paid within 30 days of receipt. The ODA is introducing a payment advice slip which informs the payee of the ODA's commitment to the CBI prompt payment code and invites them to take up an query with the head of ODA's accounts department.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [931]

Mr. Hanley: The FCO Diplomatic Wing has, since 1994, measured its payment performance using a random sample of invoices submitted throughout the year. An analysis of this sample shows that the average time taken to pay invoices is 20 days. The Overseas Development Administration takes an average of 10 days, the Wilton Park executive agency an average of 25 days and the Natural Resources Institute an average of 10 days.

Ethiopia

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support the United Kingdom Government are offering the Government of Ethiopia towards (a) the preparation of cases and (b) the setting up of courts and procedures to hear cases of human rights abuses under the former Derg regime. [530]

Mr. Hanley: Along with other members of the international community, we have given certain office equipment to the special prosecutor's office for the preparation of human rights trials involving members of the Derg regime.

Nigeria

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting between the Prime Minister and Chief Shonekan, a representative of the Nigerian military regime, on 21 September. [1209]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 21 November 1995]: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister saw Chief Shonekan on 21 September to receive a message from General Abacha. My right hon. Friend pressed first the case for clemency for General Obasanjo and the alleged coup plotters who were at that time under sentence of death; and second for rapid progress towards civilian democratic rule in Nigeria. As a prominent businessman, Chief Shonekan was not affected by EU visa restrictions on Nigeria, which applied at that time only to military personnel and their families.

Students

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's estimate of the public expenditure savings which will result from the decision not to allow students who have temporarily suspended their studies to claim social security benefit. [982]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available. In general, it is the educational maintenance system which is designed to provide support for students, not the social security system. Amendment regulations were laid before the House on 10 July to restore the original policy intention regarding students who temporarily suspend their studies, following a Court of Appeal decision. The regulations were not amended in isolation. The Department for Education and Employment has recently issued revised and expanded guidance to all local education authorities about their discretionary powers to continue to pay mandatory awards to students during periods of temporary absence.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have failed the test of incapacity but have scored (a) between one and five points, (b) between six and nine points and (c) 10 points and over. [572]

Mr. Burt: The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of incapacity benefit are currently exempt from all the work test of incapacity; how many of these (a) were previously entitled to invalidity benefit and (b) are claimants of the new incapacity benefit claimants; and if he will make a statement. [1102]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested. Of those considered for the all-work test in the period April to October 1995, a total of 159,804 people[1] have been found to be exempt. This is made up of 138,828 suffering from a severe medical condition and 20,976 in receipt of the higher rate care component of disability living allowance.

Notes:

[1] This figure excludes Incapacity Benefit claimants who are also in receipt of Widow's Benefit as this information is not currently available.

Giro Cheques

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many giro benefit cheques have been recorded lost in each year since 1979. [371]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested. Figures are available to show the numbers of requests received by Girobank for giro cheques which have been cashed, to be returned to benefit offices. These requests will be made for a number of reasons:

1. A Giro cheque has been reported as not received, stolen, lost etc., and is required for investigation purposes.
2. The customer has denied or queried the receipt of the Giro cheque.
3. The customer has queried the amount shown on the Giro cheque.

These statistics are only available from 1992–93 and are as follows:

1992–93: 697,954

1993–94: 493,113

1994–95: 444,054

In 1994–95, 82.9 million giro cheques were issued by the Benefits Agency and the Employment Service.

Income Support

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people aged under 19 years and in non-advanced education are currently claiming income support on account of their being estranged from their parents. [173]

Mr. Roger Evans: This information is not available.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the total number of claimants receiving income support towards mortgage interest in 1995, the average amount of each payment and the total cost of all such payments. [313]

Mr. Roger Evans: On the basis of the November 1994 quarterly statistical inquiry, the latest available data, it is estimated that the total number of claimants receiving income support help towards mortgage interest is 510,000, the average weekly award is £36.66 and the total annual cost is £973 million.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to make hand and arm vibration syndrome a prescribed industrial disease. [1063]

Mr. Roger Evans: We are currently considering the recommendations made by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council in its report "Hand Arm Vibration Syndrome", Cm 2844.

Staffing

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff his Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region; what is the cost of running these regional operations; what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [263]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Such information as is available is in the table:

Region	Number of staff employed by the Department including its Executive Agencies as at 1 October 1995
North	16,347
Yorks and Humberside	7,592
North west	20,795
East Midlands	4,069
West Midlands	7,071
East Anglia	1,748
South east	19,147
South west	5,092

The table excludes:

1. Staff on loan or secondment and not being paid by the Department.
2. Staff on unpaid leave for more than three months or on unpaid maternity leave; and
3. Casual staff.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children with the metabolic disease phenylketonuria have been awarded invalid care allowance; how much has been spent by Her Majesty's Government on appeals after which they have turned down the original application; how many applications have been refused; and for what reasons the refunds were made. [154]

Mr. Burt: Invalid care allowance is available to people who provide care for severely disabled people. The disability causing the person to require care is not recorded centrally and the information asked for could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [967]

Mr. Burt: There is a statutory agreement with the Public Accounts Committee to publish the results of the annual payment of bills exercise in its present format—expressed as percentages of invoices paid timeously.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [922]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested.

Our aim is that all such bills should be paid within any special terms agreed, or if none exist within 30 days of receipt of the goods or service, or 30 days of receipt of a valid invoice, whichever of these is the later. Our latest monitoring exercise of the timeous payment of bills show that to date we are achieving 96 per cent. payment on time.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days or in accordance with special terms agreed in each of the last five years. [1124]

Mr. Burt: Information is not available for the financial years 1990–91 and 1991–92. For 1992–93 and 1993–94 information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Details for the financial year 1994–95 and 1995–96 to 31 October are in the table.

Agency	1994–95	1995–96 to 31 October
DSS Headquarters	179,810.00	385,221.00
Benefits Agency	248,143.47	62,526.36
Resettlement Agency	1,872.87	1,948.86
War Pensions Agency	1,373.02	23,781.77
Child Support Agency	185,583.32	53,773.75
Information Technology Services Agency	24,899.67	1,255.20
Contributions Agency	1,298,024.38	47,178.46

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (i) orders and (ii) firms are represented by the 10.5 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of those are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [915]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested.

The number of firms represented by the 10.5 per cent. of invoices not paid by DSS headquarters within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95 is 33.

The method of recording suppliers and payments does not allow for differentiation categories of suppliers with fewer than 500 employees.

Living Standards

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in which year since 1965 the living standards of each decile of high to low income population were half their present level; and in which such year average living standards were half their present level. [1518]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The available information relates to income as measured in "Households Below Average Income"; this is "equivalent" income—household income adjusted for household size and composition. The DSS series runs from 1979; the Institute for Fiscal Studies has extended it back to the 1960s. This shows that incomes in the top decile doubled between 1965 and 1992–93. Average equivalent income as measured in HBAI, and incomes in other deciles, did not double within this period. The HBAI measure has weaknesses as a guide to living standards, especially at the bottom of the income distribution.

HEALTH

NHS Capital Investment

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on procedures for, and stages of, public consultation in relation to NHS capital investment plans which involve transfer of services and closure of hospitals. [582]

Mr. Sackville: Health authorities are expected to consult local people and statutory and voluntary agencies in drawing up their annual purchasing plans and longer-term strategies. Health authorities also have a statutory responsibility to consult community health councils on any proposals for substantial changes in service provision. Where a community health council contests a proposal to close or change the use of a hospital the matter is referred to the regional health authority. If the regional health authority supports the proposal, it is referred to Ministers to make a decision.

NHS Staff

Mr. Hugh Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacant posts for (a) consultants and (b) other medical staff there were in English NHS trusts in each region on (i) 15 April 1994 and (ii) at the latest date for which figures are available in (1) psychiatry, (2) accident and emergency, (3) geriatric medicine, (4) general surgery, (5) anaesthetics, (6) general medicine and (7) obstetrics and gynaecology. [542]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce a system of assessment for (a) consultants and (b) general practitioners; and if he will make a statement. [326]

Mr. Malone: The report, "Maintaining Medical Excellence", made a number of recommendations to ensure that standards of professional performance are maintained at a higher level. For hospital doctors, it recommended that employers and professional bodies should explore the feasibility, costs and benefits of mentoring systems and report back. For general practitioners, it recommended that for regulatory purposes systems of objective assessment against a national framework should be introduced into vocational training, subject to satisfactory costing.

The report was issued for consultation in August and we are awaiting the outcome of the consultation exercise, which ends on 29 December 1995.

NHS Treatment Costs

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the reasons for not making patients aware of the cost of their individual treatment. [1097]

Mr. Malone: Present costing systems within the national health service are intended to provide accurate estimates of total costs involved in providing a service at a pre-determined level of activity. This system enables average treatment costs to be produced, and it is these figures that are used in the price lists for extra contractual referrals. The price lists are available to the public. The additional costing work necessary to produce individual patient treatment costs would not represent best use of NHS resources.

"Mental Health and Stress in the Work Place"

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish the pamphlet, "Mental Health and Stress in the Work Place", which he commissioned; what factors underlay the timing of publication; what were its main recommendations; and if he will make a statement. [327]

Mr. Bowis: The booklet "Mental Health and Stress in the Work Place" is not, and was never intended to be, a Department of Health publication. I understand that the document will be published in due course. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on its content prior to publication.

Mentally Ill Homeless People

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he has taken, and what money he has allocated for (a) key teams of care workers to make contact with mentally ill homeless people, (b) specialist hostels and (c) provision of permanent homes with care following the homeless mentally ill initiative; and if he will make a statement. [325]

Mr. Bowis: Over £20 million has been allocated to the homeless mentally ill initiative since it was launched in 1990. This has covered the capital costs of 10 short-stay hostels providing nearly 150 bed spaces. The long-term revenue costs of these high-care bed spaces are met from the mental illness specific grant; costs are currently £15,500 per annum per bed space for the first three years, tapering to £7,750. This funding will continue for the foreseeable future. The Housing Corporation has committed £9.5 million to the provision of 181 units of move-on accommodation. Funding for five multi-disciplinary community psychiatric outreach teams is built into the annual allocations to regional health authorities.

Cardiac Services

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities in London do not have the necessary technical equipment in their locality to undertake (a) permanent pacemaker implantations and (b) cardiac catheterisation; when he estimates they will all be able to provide these operations; and if he will make a statement. [339]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Khat

Mr. Tim Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what review is being made of the harmful health effects of khat; and what plans are being made for banning it in the United Kingdom. [311]

Mr. Bowis: The Department of Health continues to monitor the misuse of khat. Khat is not subject to control under the international United Nation drug treaties and we have no plans at present to schedule it under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. The key criterion in the 1971 Act is whether the misuse of a substance has or is capable of having harmful effects sufficient to constitute a social problem.

The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs considered the misuse of khat in 1988 against this criterion and reached the view that bringing it within the 1971 Act's controls would not be appropriate.

We are keeping the matter under review.

File WOP/4/5

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date and where his Department's file WOP/4/5 that was mislaid in 1981 was discovered; what was the cause of it being mislaid; and if he will make a statement. [55]

Mr. Sackville: The file was found on 4 August 1995 among closed files retained for reference. The file had been closed in 1990, but this had not been noted.

Embryo Eggs

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department is taking in respect of (a) the commercial selling of embryo eggs and (b) gender clinics. [1020]

Mr. Sackville: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority is reviewing its policy on the payment of egg and sperm donors and will examine any claim that a licensed clinic is acting improperly. In the light of this review, the Government will consider whether any action needs to be taken.

The HFEA has advised all centres which it licenses for infertility treatment that sex selection for social reasons is not acceptable. Sperm separation techniques used in gender clinics offering sex selection for social reasons are considered to have no scientific basis.

Bradford Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will carry out an investigation in conjunction with the Bradford Royal Infirmary NHS trust into the (a) age, (b) ethnic background and (c) mental state for the female patient who had stitches to a wound carried out by a 16-year-old work experience trainee; and if he will make a statement. [62]

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for Bradford Hospitals National Health Service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact Rodney Walker, chairman of the trust for details.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been given by his Department to regional offices on the future funding status and remit of community health councils. [320]

Mr. Malone: Following consultation on the report of the NHS executive's working group on the future establishing arrangements for community health councils, we intend to issue revised guidance shortly.

NHS Treatment Entitlement

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the procedures that are in place and identify and charge patients who are not eligible for free NHS treatment and the mechanism used to ensure that the procedures are in place and followed. [1096]

Mr. Sackville: The procedures to identify and charge patients who are not eligible for free national health service treatment are found in the manual of guidance for the NHS treatment of overseas visitors, copies of which are available in the Library.

The Department liaises regularly with NHS officials who have immediate responsibility for enforcing the procedures.

Emergency Admissions

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has commissioned into changes in numbers of accident and emergency admissions and surgical emergency admissions; and if he will place in the Library copies of guidance issued to health authorities or regions about funding these types of admissions in (a) the current year and (b) future years. [322]

Mr. Sackville: My Department has not commissioned research into changes in the numbers of accident and emergency and surgical emergency admissions; nor has it issued guidance on funding these admissions.

Osteopaths Act 1993

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons the Osteopaths Act 1993 has not fully been brought into force; and when he intends to fully bring it into force. [198]

Mr. Sackville: We expect to announce the membership of the General Osteopathic Council shortly. The Osteopaths Act will be brought into force in stages according to the programme the Council develops for implementing the statutory scheme.

Residential Accommodation

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people, since the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, are known to have deliberately deprived themselves by transferring their assets; and what action was taken against them under section 21 of the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudication Act 1983; [1129]

(2) what plans he has to strengthen the law with respect to the deliberate transfer of assets. [1130]

Mr. Bowis: Information on numbers of people who have deliberately deprived themselves of assets for the purposes of reducing their contribution towards the cost of residential accommodation, and any action taken against them under section 21 of the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudication Act is not available centrally.

The legislation relating to charging for residential accommodation, including the deprivation of assets, is kept under constant review.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement clarifying the role of the state and the individual in paying for long-term care; and if he will make that information widely available to the elderly. [1134]

Mr. Bowis: The role of the state and the individual in paying for residential care is as laid down by the Government of 1948 in their National Assistance Act.

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measure he proposes to take to ensure that the national health service can cope with an above-average demand for hospital admission; and if he will make a statement. [1153]

Mr. Sackville: Planning for fluctuating levels of hospital admission is a routine task for health authorities and hospitals, taking into account previous experience and local circumstances.

"The Health of the Nation"

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of "The Health of the Nation" [258]

Mr. Sackville: "The Health of the Nation" is a Government strategy. It is subject to environmental monitoring and appraisal in the same way as other Government policies.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if (1) "The Health of the Nation" Cm 1523, was (a) subject to and (b) modified on account of environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in policy appraisal and the environment produced by the Department of the Environment; and if he will publish the appraisal; [256]

(2) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in "The Health of the Nation" were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department. [257]

Mr. Sackville: "The Health of the Nation" is a Government strategy agreed after widespread consultation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment was fully involved in that consultation and is a member of the Cabinet sub-committee which oversees development and monitoring of the strategy. Healthy environments are one of the "healthy settings" which "The Health of the Nation" recognises as being important to public health. The Government's policy on environmental matters is described in the Environment White Paper, "This Common Inheritance" and the sustainable development strategy.

Staffing

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff his Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region; what is the cost of running these regional operations; what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [265]

Mr. Sackville: The information requested on staff employed in each of the standard English regions is shown in the table.

Information about departmental running costs by region is not available. Details of the Department's gross running costs are provided in the Department's annual report for 1994–95, Cm 2512.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average length of time that it takes his Department to pay invoices. [930]

Mr. Sackville: The latest available information shows that the average time in 1994–95 was 16 days.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within the agreed credit period or within 30 days in each of the last five years; [1068]

(2) how many orders and firms are represented by the 8.1 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of those are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [917]

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [958]

Mr. Sackville: The Department's policy, which will be published in the Departmental annual report, is to make payment to suppliers within the time limits agreed and specified in contracts with them. This will normally be within 30 days. Where appropriate, departmental contracts also require contractors to make payment to sub-contractors within 30 days of receipt of an invoice.

Population Statistics

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the population is (a) white European, (b) Asian, (c) black and (d) other ethnic minorities. [113]

Mr. Sackville: The latest available information from the labour force survey is shown in the table:

Ethnic group	Estimated percentage of private household population of Great Britain during period June 1994 to May 1995
White	[1]94.2
Asian	3.4
Black	1.7
Other groups	0.6
Total	[2]100.0

[1] All but 0.5 per cent. of people in the White group are estimated to have European Nationality (Including Turkey and nations from the former USSR).
[2] Percentages do not sum exactly to 100.0 because of rounding.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1433]

Mr. Sackville: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister.

I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 19 July Official Report, column 1286 and on 24 October, Official Report, column 571.

Vitamins

Mr. Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to fortify cereal grain flour in accordance with recommendations of the Medical Research Council vitamin study; and if he will make a statement. [334]

Mrs. Browning: I have been asked to reply.

The Medical Research Council vitamin study research group on the prevention of neural tube defects made no recommendations on the fortification of foods. An expert advisory group was, however, convened to consider the dietary implications of the results of the MRC study. Its report recommended inter alia that the range of breads and breakfast cereals fortified with folic acid should be increased; that fortification with folic acid should be limited to breads and breakfast cereals; and that there should continue to be available a choice of unfortified breads and breakfast cereals. There was no recommendation to fortify flour. In response to the report the Government have encouraged the food industry to increase the range of breads and breakfast cereals fortified with folic acid on a voluntary basis. It is estimated that last year 50 to 60 per cent. of breakfast cereals and about 10 per cent. of breads were fortified with folic acid.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Transport buses and (b) London Underground while on official business; [405]

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Minister without portfolio how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Transport buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [399]

Mr. Roger Freeman: None.

Energy Consumption

Mr. Battle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility, in each year since 1990. [1453]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) on Wednesday 17 May 1995 Official Report, column 260.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [936]

Mr. Freeman: The average length of time taken by my Department to pay invoices is 27 days.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [954]

Mr. Freeman: In accordance with the Government's undertaking given in the 1994 competitiveness White Paper, my Department sets out its payment policy in its annual report, Cm 2820, together with payment performance statistics expressed as a percentage of invoices paid. It is not intended to change the method by which performance is measured.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the pilot project for a single licensing point for small businesses. [945]

Mr. Freeman: A study into a computer-based, one-stop system to provide new businesses with customised information about their regulatory and licensing requirements was announced on 8 August 1995. The study, which is being undertaken by KPMG Management Consulting, is due to be completed by the end of this year. Following the study, the intention is to undertake a pilot scheme in some selected business links covering starting up as a vehicle component manufacturer, a corner shop, a small hotelier and a small builder. Depending on the outcome of the pilot the Government, will consider the case for extending the system to other sectors of business and all areas of the country.

Deregulation

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what have been (a) the staffing costs and (b) other running costs of the administrative support to the deregulation unit; and what future expenditure has been estimated. [1650]

Mr. Freeman: The total staffing costs and other running costs of the deregulation unit are as follows:

£ thousands

	1994–95 Outturn	1995–96 Budget
Staffing costs	1,038	1,171
Other running costs	193	194

The 1995–96 budget was set before the unit's transfer to the Cabinet Office from the Department of Trade and Industry in July 1995.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what has been the total amount expended on travel and subsistence expenses in respect of the deregulation task force so far; and what future expenditure has been estimated. [1651]

Mr. Freeman: The total amount of expenditure on travel and subsistence in respect of the deregulation task force since it was set up in July 1994 to 31 October 1995 is £8,564. Future expenditure is expected to be at similar levels.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the members of the deregulation task force indicating the factors underlying the recruitment of each member. [1652]

Mr. Freeman: There are 16 member of the deregulation task force, which is chaired by the right hon. Francis Maude of Morgan Stanley Ltd.

The other members are: David Band (Barclays de Zoete Wedd); David Campbell (Laporte Fine Organics Ltd.); Maurice Denyer (Fowler Bros (Cowfold) Ltd.); Michael Fallon (Quality Care Homes plc); Mike Fisher (Whale Tankers Ltd.) George Goring (The Goring Hotel); Teresa Graham (Baker Tilly); Janet Morgan (Sainsbury Family Charitable Trusts); Archie Norman (Asda Group plc); Timothy Parker (Kenwood Appliances plc); David Parry (formerly BP); Tony Rammelt (Regis Europe Ltd.); Roger Singleton (Barnardo's); Dan Wright (Albion Automotive Ltd.) and Peter Wyman (Coopers and Lybrand).

Members have been drawn from across a wide range of industries, and from the voluntary sector. They have been appointed for the personal contribution they can make to the deregulation initiative and to the work of the task force.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [937]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [953]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

TRANSPORT

British Rail

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff have left British Rail since January 1993 under redundancy or early retirement arrangements; and what has been the total cost of payments made to staff leaving the industry. [283]

Mr. Watts: I understand that 24,364 staff have left British Rail under voluntary redundancy or early retirement arrangements, at a cost of £471.4 million. There have been no compulsory redundancies. In this time, BR has made significant efficiency improvements, bringing benefits to farepayers and taxpayers.

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many British Rail locomotives are currently being stored out of use as surplus to requirements or to the cannibalised for spare parts; how many have been offered for sale to operators or potential operators in (a) Britain and (b) overseas; and how many are available for sale; [182]

(2) if he will take steps to require British Rail to make surplus locomotives and wagons available for sale to private operators. [408]

Mr. Watts: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

In relation to passenger services, vehicles currently in store represent a small percentage of the total fleet; nevertheless it is for the three rolling stock leasing companies to decide when and on what terms these vehicles are offered for sale. Other than when the vehicles are being cannibalised for spare parts, the franchising director must be informed in advance of the disposal and be given an opportunity to bid.

As for vehicles used for freight services, where equipment has no current or potential use, it should be offered for competitive sale. It is for British Rail to determine whether or not equipment is surplus to requirements.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates were given to him by British Rail for its costs arising from the restructuring of British Rail for rail privatisation in (a) the current financial year and (b) the forthcoming financial year. [289]

Mr. Watts: British Rail estimates its costs linked to privatisation for the period 1 April 1995 to 30 September 1995 to be £44 million. No estimate has been received for the second half of 1995–96 or for 1996–97.

London Transport Property

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated book value of all assets owned by London Transport Property for each of the years 1979 to 1995. [274]

Mr. Norris: London Transport Property is a division of London Transport and does not itself own property assets but, as agent, manages the property portfolios of LT and its subsidiaries. Information is not available in the form requested, but London Transport's annual report and accounts, copies of which are available in the Library, give information for each year on the value of assets, including property, owned or occupied by LT or its subsidiaries.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the gross sales revenue received by London Transport Property for each of the years 1979 to 1995. [275]

Mr. Norris: London Transport's property revenue for these years is shown in its annual report and accounts, copies of which are available in the Library.

Environmental Pollution

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those recommendations of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution his Department (a) has implemented, (b) plans to have implemented within the next 12 months, (c) plans to have implemented within the next 24 months, (d) plans to have implemented by 2000 and (e) has no plans to implement. [278]

Sir George Young: We have asked for views on the Royal Commission report as part of the national debate on transport policy.

"Transport: The Way Ahead"

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to publish the findings of his "Transport: The Way Ahead" consultation. [297]

Sir George Young: A further report drawing together the threads of the transport debate will be published when my colleagues and I have considered the responses to "Transport: The Way Ahead".

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those policies he has so far implemented as a result of his "Transport: The Way Ahead" consultation. [296]

Sir George Young: It would be premature to announce results from the discussions of "Transport: The Way Ahead" before my colleagues and I have properly considered the responses made to us.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of responses he has received to his "Transport: The Way Ahead" Consultation. [279]

Sir George Young: We have so far received about 200 written responses, many of which represent the collected views of a range of different people. In addition, we have received reports from a number of seminars which have been held around the country, at which various groups were represented. Further written responses and seminar reports are expected.

Railtrack

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff have left Railtrack Group plc since January 1993 under redundancy or early retirement arrangements; and what has been the total cost of payments made to staff leaving the industry. [280]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack was formally vested with operating assets, including staff, on 31 March 1994. Since that date, some 463 staff have left the company, at a cost of £11,050,000 in severance costs.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the total remuneration paid by his Department to (a) the chairman of Railtrack Group plc, (b) the chief executive of Railtrack Group plc, (c) the finance director of Railtrack Group plc, (d) the director of safety and standards of Railtrack Group plc, (e) the director of engineering and production of Railtrack Group plc and (f) the commercial director of Railtrack Group plc. [277]

Mr. Watts: None. Directors of the Railtrack Group plc board are paid by the company.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funds his Department has spent on advice from consultants, outside organisations and individuals on the recruitment of (a) the chairman of Railtrack Group plc, (b) the chief executive of Railtrack Group plc, (c) the finance director of Railtrack Group plc, (d) the director of safety and standards of Railtrack Group plc, (e) the director of engineering and production of Railtrack Group plc and (f) the commercial director of Railtrack Group plc. [276]

Mr. Watts: None.

Accidents (Greater London)

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of (a) road accidents involving heavy goods vehicles within the Greater London area for each of the following years, (b) serious injuries resulting from those accidents and (c) fatalities in each year from 1991 to 1995. [271]

Mr. Norris: The information request is shown in the following table.

Injury road accidents in Greater London involving HGVs

	1991	1992	1993	1994
No Accidents	1,184	1,048	1,078	1,118
Fatalities	35	38	38	36
Serious Injuries	242	237	192	221

Trunk Roads

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if the "Trunk Roads in England—1994 Review" was (a) subject to, and (b) modified on account of, an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment", produced by the Department of the Environment; and if he will publish the appraisal; [259]

(2) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in the "Trunk Roads in England—1994 Review" were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department. [260]

Mr. Watts: The 1994 review involved a reassessment of priorities within the roads programme rather than the adoption of a new policy. As explained in paragraph 4.5 of "Trunk Roads in England—1994 Review", each scheme's likely effects on the environment were taken into account during the review. A number of schemes were withdrawn because they could not achieve an acceptable environmental balance.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedures have been put in place by his Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of the "Trunk Roads in England—1994 Review". [261]

Mr. Watts: The environmental impacts of each scheme in the national roads programme are assessed and considered carefully before a decision is taken to proceed.

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funding his Department has provided for maintenance of the trunk roads network within the Greater London area in each of the years from 1991 to 1995. [273]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Ms Glenda Jackson, dated 22 November 1995:

As you known, Steven Norris has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport what funding his Department has provided for maintenance of the trunk road network within the Greater London area in each of the years from 1991 to 1995.

The breakdown between Current and Capital maintenance expenditure on London's trunk road network is as follows:

£ million

Financial year	Capital expenditure	Current expenditure	Total
1991–92	42.2	18.6	60.8
1992–93	40.3	22.8	63.1
1993–94	44.6	22.5	67.1
1994–95	64.6	19.4	84.0

Current maintenance is largely safety-related and covers routine tasks, such as cleansing, changing light bulbs, grass cutting, winter gritting, emergencies/incidents cover, addressing safety defects and inspections. Capital maintenance includes essential repairs to carriageways, footways and structures to ensure safety and to protect the investment in the infrastructure.

The variability in the Capital expenditure can be explained by variability in the requirement for major maintenance works. For example, in 1994 the M4 near Heathrow and the M1 near Scratchwood were successfully refurbished, including carriageway and drainage repairs, bridgeworks and the replacement of safety fencing and street lighting. I would add that the work was carried out with very little disruption to road users.

Rail Privatisation

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funds he has made available to the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising to implement rail privatisation; and what are his estimates for the financial years 1995–96, 1996–97, 1997–98. [292]

Mr. Watts: The public expenditure plans announced in last year's unified budget allocated provision for the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising to spend £11 million in 1995–96. Provisions was made for the expenditure of £10 million in 1996–97 and in 1997–98.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funds he has made available to the Office of the Rail Regulator to implement rail privatisation; and what are his estimates for the financial years 1995–96, 1996–97, 1997–98. [293]

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 31 October that the Office of the Rail Regulator would have provisions for expenditure of £10 million this year, Official Report, column 131. Provision has been made for the expenditure of £7 million in 1996–97 and in 1997–98.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funds his Department has spent, or is estimated to spend, on preparations for rail privatisation, excluding funds made available to (a) British Rail, (b) Railtrack Group Plc, (c) Opraf and (d) the Office of the Rail Regulator in (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96 and (iii) 1996–97. [294]

Mr. Watts: The answers are as follows:

(i) 1992–93: £6.7 million
(ii) 1993–94: £13.5 million
(iii) 1994–95: £14.2 million
(iv) 1995–96: £24.6 million
(v) 1996–97: £5.3 million

Figures for 1995–96 onwards are current estimates. These exclude main sale costs for the flotation of Railtrack, which are yet to be determined.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funds he made available to Railtrack to implement privatisation in 1994–95; and what is his estimate for 1995–96. [291]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack spent £46 million on privatisation-related expenditure in 1994–95. The estimate for 1995–96 is £30 million.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will show for all consultants and other outside organisations or individuals currently or previously employed by his Department for advice or assistance in rail privatisation (a) the name of the consultancy, organisation or individual, (b) the length of the contract offered to each consultancy, organisation or individual, (c) the total amount inclusive of VAT paid to date to each consultancy, organisation or individual and (d) the services required by his Department from each consultancy, organisation or individual; and if he will make a statement. [270]

Mr. Watts: Information about payments to individual contractors is commercially confidential.

Payments made to date to consultants currently or previously employed by the Department total £35.4 million.

Consultants currently employed by the Department on rail privatisation are:

Company	Consultancy
Linklaters and Paines	Legal advice
Freshfields	Legal advice
Samuel Montagu	Merchant Banking
Hambros	Merchant Banking
SBC Warburg	Merchant Banking
Merril Lynch	Merchant Banking
KPMG Peat Marwick	Accountancy and Taxation
Ernst and Young	Accountancy
Price Waterhouse	Accountancy
Shandwick	Marketing
Gresham	Marketing
Dewe Rogerson	Marketing
Ernst and Young	Information Systems
Richard Ellis	Property matters
Sedgwick	Insurance
Brodies	Advice on Scots law
Travers Morgan	Specialist advice on BRIS contract pricing
Ernst and Young	Corporate finance advice on BRIS contract pricing

Consultants previously employed by the Department on rail privatisation are:

Company	Consultancy
Arthur D. Little	Research
Coopers and Lybrand	Access and access charging
Mercer Management	Freight and franchising
Norman Broadbent	Recruitment
Putnham Hayes and Bartlett	Access and access charging
Debenham Tewson and Chinnocks	Property matters
NERA	Regulatory matters
Deloitte Haskins and Sells	Industry structure

Contracts for consultancy advice are normally offered on an on-going basis with provision for the Department to terminate the contract.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what funds he has made available to British Rail for reorganisation in preparation for privatisation. [290]

Mr. Watts: Costs linked to privatisation incurred by British Rail are shown in the table:

	£ million cash
1993–94	92.2
1994–95	85.0
1995–96	[1]44.0

Note:
[1] Estimated costs to 30 September 1995.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which lines in the West Yorkshire region will be receiving maintenance attention before rail privatisation. [1447]

Mr. Watts: All operational railway lines in West Yorkshire are maintained in accordance with statutory requirements and Railtrack's rigorous safety standards.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list each British Rail (a) subsidiary and (b) company formerly part of British Rail which has been privatised indicating the receipts from each sale. [1274]

Mr. Watts: Sales have been completed for the following businesses:

Red Star
Special Trains Unit
BRIS Design Offices
DCU Birmingham
Mainline Swindon
IDG Glasgow
BPE Mechanical and Engineering Consultancy, Doncaster.
Civil Engineering Design Group, York.
BR Maintenance Ltd.
Swindon Electronic Service Centre
Chart Leacon Depot
Ilford Depot
Doncaster Depot
Wolverton Depot
Springburn Depot
Eastleigh Depot
OBS Services Ltd.
Meldon Quarry Ltd.
Baileyfield Switches and Crossings Works
Ditton Timber Treatment Works
Quality and Safety Services Ltd.
BR QAS Ltd.

Gross proceeds to date from these sales amount to nearly £47 million. Details of individual sales completed by BR will be made public in due course, but it would be contrary to the commercial interests of British Rail and the Government to publish those details at this stage, as they may prejudice sales still in progress. In addition to proceeds from sales by BR, proceeds of approximately £1.8 billion are expected from the sales of the rolling stock leasing companies, following the signing of sale and purchase agreements announced on 9 November.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [968]

Mr. Norris: The transport report sets out the Department's payment policy and records performance against targets, in terms of the percentage of bills paid within the time allowed. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade reports to the House each year the performance of all Departments. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 18 July, Official Report, column 1211–12.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [920]

Mr. Norris: No average payment times are calculated. Our objective is to pay 95 per cent. of bills within contractual conditions, or—where no other conditions are stated—within 30 days of receipt of goods or services or presentation of a valid invoice, whichever is the later.

Robin Hood Line

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what compensation he will give to the residents of Nottinghamshire in respect of their contributions to the cost of the Robin Hood line. [1613]

Mr. Norris: The Government have contributed over £6.5 million to stages 1 and 2 of the Robin Hood line; the balance was funded by the European regional development fund and the local authorities concerned. We are discussing with Nottinghamshire county council the case for making a further Government contribution towards the capital cost of the scheme.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he is planning to privatise the Robin Hood line. [1624]

Mr. Norris: Services on the Robin Hood line have been designated as experimental services and are currently being operated by Central Trains Ltd. under an agreement with Nottinghamshire county council. The operating agreement would pass to a future franchisee. The franchising director aims to offer Central to the private sector during or after 1996. The inclusion of the Robin Hood line services in the passenger service requirement for the franchise will be considered by the franchising director before the expiry of the five-year experimental period.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when fishing vessels are (a) registered an (b) re-registered what checking procedures occur in respect of (i) actual engine capacity, (ii) convictions for illegal fishing, (iii) unpaid fines and (iv) the financial status and viability of the company owing the vessel; and if he will make it his policy to institute such checks and refuse licenses when the results are unsatisfactory. [979]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Marine Safety Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. Austin Mitchell, dated 22 November 1995:

I have been asked to reply to your Question about the checks undertaken on the registration and re-registration of fishing vessels.

Fishing vessels are registered and re-registered in accordance with the Merchant Shipping (Registration of Ships) Regulations 1993. The only check listed in the Question which is required by the Regulations is details of engine capacity. Such information is provided to the Registry by surveyors and measurers authorised for that purpose by the Secretary of State.

Matters concerning the issue of fishing licences are the responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Ferries (Evacuation Requirements)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what instructions he has issued to the companies who own the (a) Pride of Bruges, (b) Pride of Cherbourg, (c) Pride of Hampshire and (d) Pioneer ferries to ensure that they fulfil 100 per cent. dry-shod evacuation arrangements; what time limit he has set the companies to fulfil this commitment; what has been their reply; and if he will make a statement. [57]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Marine Safety Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 November 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your Question about what instructions have been issued to the companies who own the four ferries named, what time limits have been set and what has been their reply.

The evacuation requirements for these ferries have not changed. However, the operators concerned have advised that they now offer 100% dry shod evacuation arrangements from these vessels. They have achieved this by limiting the number of passengers carried.

Night Flights (Heathrow)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what penalties exist for those who exceed the night flight maximum into Heathrow; and if he will list the occasions when such penalties have been levied in each of the past five years. [9]

Mr. Norris: The current night restrictions regime, which began in winter 1993–94, includes provision for end of season flexibility. This allows a carry-over of 10 per cent. of the movements limits if there is a surplus and anticipation of up to 10 per cent. of the next season's movements in the event of overrun. Any excess overrun would be penalised in the following season at double the amount of the excess.

Under the previous regime, if the maximum number of movements at Heathrow was exceeded by 50 or fewer movements, the limit for the following season was reduced by the same number; if by more than 50 movements, the limit for the following season was reduced by a total of 50 plus twice the number of movements in excess of 50. Movements underused in a season could be carried forward to the following season, subject to a maximum of 50.

In two seasons within the last five years, the number of night movements in the relevant period has exceeded the limit but has been within the end of season flexibility arrangements. In the winter 1992–93 season, there were 3,078 movements, of which 3,000 counted against the limit, 43 movements scored against the amount carried forward from the previous season, and the remaining 35 movements were deducted from the movements limit for the summer 1993 season. In winter 1994–95, there were 2,668 movements; the limit was 2,550 but the excess was within the amount carried forward from the previous season.

In all other seasons within the last five years, the number of night movements has been within the limits.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many aircraft are allowed to fly into Heathrow between 23.30 and 0600. [8]

Mr. Norris: In my announcement of 16 August 1995, I confirmed the night flying restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. These restrictions include a control on the number of aircraft movements permitted by season. The movements limit for the winter season at Heathrow is 2,550, the limit for the summer season is 3,250.

In addition, the movements of aircraft which are exempt from the night restrictions are unrestricted. Exempt aircraft are jet aircraft with a maximum certificated weight not exceeding 11,600 kg and those propeller aircraft which on the basis of their noise data are classified at less than 87 EPNdB.

The arrangements for dispensations in various exceptional circumstances also continue to apply. A copy of the relevant guidelines was placed in the House Library on 6 May 1994.

Aircraft Noise Limits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the occasions on which airport companies have fined those who have infringed noise limits under their charging powers in the last year for which figures are available (a) at Heathrow and (b) at other airports. [7]

Mr. Norris: The Secretary of State may set requirements for limiting noise at airports designated for the purposes of section 78 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. The only airports so designated are Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. The noise limits are 110 PNdB (97 dBA) by day (0701–2300) and 102 PNdB (89 dBA) by night (2301–0700).

From 1 April 1993 at Heathrow and Stansted and from 1 May 1993 at Gatwick, the airport companies have imposed financial penalties for breaches of the night noise limits and are progressively introducing financial penalties for the breaches of the daytime noise limits. Information on breaches of the noise limits and on the fines collected is provided by each of those airport companies to their respective airport consultative committees. I have asked the three airport companies to send the reports for the last 12 months to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North.

At other airports, noise mitigation measures are the responsibility of the airport operator.

Nuclear Rail Flask Incidents

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of nuclear rail flask incidents declared in each year from 1990 to 1995. [281]

Mr. Norris: This information is not readily available. I will write to the hon. Member.

Western Orbital Motorway

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to undertake a full environment and economic impact assessment of the proposed western orbital motorway; and if he will make a statement. [583]

Mr. Watts: Economic and environmental appraisal is carried out throughout the life of a scheme. If draft orders were published for the western orbital, the results of the work at that stage would also be published.

Transport Infrastructure Schemes (Greater London)

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those transport infrastructure schemes within the Greater London area to which his Department has contributed funding in excess of £10 million over the past 16 years, the amount of funding provided to each scheme, the start date for each scheme and the completion date for each scheme. [295]

Mr. Norris: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Details of the Department of Transport's spending since 1989–90 are set out in "Transport Report 1995", presented to Parliament in March 1995.

Pollution

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his Department's policy to take account of the prevailing winds when pollution samples are taken along motorways; and if he will make a statement. [1317]

Mr. Norris: Whenever air quality monitoring is undertaken, the possible effect of the prevailing wind is taken into account as part of the measurement.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at what distance from the edge of a motorway sampling is taken for PM10 and particulates. [1316]

Mr. Norris: Where PM10 and particulates are sampled, there is no fixed distance from the motorway edge applied. The distance is normally set by the requirements of the sampling equipment and the characteristics of the monitoring location.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what reports his Department receives from the Department of the Environment in respect of the monitoring of pollution along motorways. [1318]

Mr. Norris: We receive no such reports. The Department of the Environment does not carry out air quality monitoring adjacent to motorways.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the terms of reference given by his Department when measuring air quality along motorways. [1315]

Mr. Norris: There are no fixed terms of reference for the measurement of air quality alongside motorways.

Each site is assessed on a preliminary basis in accordance with the design manual for roads and bridges volume 11 "Environmental Assessment" and this informs the need for any further specific measurements.

River Thames (Freight)

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the volume of freight, in tonnes, carried on the River Thames in each year from 1979 to 1995. [272]

Mr. Norris: The volume of freight, in millions of tonnes, carried on the River Thames in each year from 1980 to 1994 was as follows:

Year	Internal traffic	Seagoing traffic
1980	6.15	20.49
1981	5.40	18.36
1982	4.39	21.18
1983	3.72	21.13
1984	3.78	19.65
1985	3.50	21.74
1986	3.18	23.30
1987	3.00	20.90
1988	2.93	23.43
1989	3.17	23.25
1990	2.00	24.75
1991	1.83	21.83
1992	1.84	20.89
1993	1.87	20.39
1994	2.83	21.30

Figures not available for 1979.

Fare Capping

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of passenger rail fares will be capped as a result of the Government's fare capping formulae. [282]

Mr. Watts: Across the network, regulation will ensure that there is at least one regulated fare available for every journey. The percentage of passenger revenue subject to fares regulation will vary according to the nature of the franchise. Invitations to tender have been issued in respect of seven passenger rail services—LTS Rail, Great Western, South West Trains, InterCity East Coast, Midland Main Line, Network SouthCentral and Gatwick Express. For those which provide a significant number of commuter services, the percentage of passenger revenue subject to fares regulation, based on 1994–95 figures, is expected to be between approximately 47 per cent., and 80 per cent. For InterCity services, the range is expected to be between approximately 21 per cent. and 25 per cent. These figures do not include Gatwick Express, for which only a very small percentage of passenger revenue will be subject to fares regulation.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1426]

Sir George Young: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. No certificates signed by Ministers in my Department have been produced in proceedings in the last five years. Certificates were signed in 1990 and 1992 and in relation to them. I refer to my reply to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones) on 16 October 1995, Official Report, column 91.

M11 Link Road

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how much has so far been spent on legal surveillance and other relevant costs to construct cases against people protesting against the building of the M11 link road; how much further public expenditure is expected to bring the cases to trail; how much it is expected will be recouped if the cases are successful; and if he will make a statement; [323]

(2) if he will list the resident engineers of the various contracts in connection with the A12 Hackney to M11 link road; if he will indicate their salaries and to whom they are responsible; what discrepancies on contractors' claims on personnel matters they have discovered; and if he will make a statement. [328]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Harry Cohen, dated 22 November 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions asking the Secretary of State for Transport, about the A12 Hackney Wick to M11 Link Road including resident engineers and contractors' claims and the costs of pursing injunctions to stop protestors interfering with the works.

The resident engineers for the A12 Hackney Wick to M11 Link Road are, for Contract 2, Mr P Mann and for Contract 4, Mr J P Wood, both of W S Atkins.

The Code of Practice on Access to Government Information exempts disclosure of Third Party's commerical confidences such as employees' salaries. Resident engineers are responsible to the company employing them.

If your reference to personnel matters relates to security personnel, I can confirm that in the last two years there have been claims containing errors or anomalies which have been discovered by the resident engineers' staff. The number of these instances has been about average for a contract of this type and all the claims have been resolved under the terms of the contract. However, if you have details of particular discrepancies these will of course be investigated.

Costs of pursing injunctions incurred to date amount to about £600,000. In order to minimise costs while at the same protecting the contract from continuation of these unlawful protests, the Secretary of State is minded to accept permanent in junction against named defendants and to leave aside the financial aspects provided these injunctions are conceded.

An offer has been made by the Secretary of State in these terms. Whether further costs arise and to what value, will depend on the defendants and if they concede the injunctions.

Forth Rail Bridge

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when Railtrack expects to be able to carry out the structural investigation of the Forth rail bridge in accordance with the stipulation of the Health and Safety Executive as part of its investigation of the Forth rail bridge. [1254]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack is currently carrying out the structural analysis of the bridge, as requested by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidance his Department issued to Railtrack in relation to its co-operation with the Health and Safety Executive's report on the structural condition of the Forth rail bridge. [1256]

Mr. Watts: The Department has issued no specific guidance to Railtrack.

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on painting the Forth rail bridge in each financial year since 1989–1990; and how the arrangements for painting the bridge have been changed during this period. [1258]

Mr. Watts: I understand that British Rail spent approximately £0.5 million on painting and £0.5 million on other maintenance in each financial year from 1989–90 to 1993–94. Railtrack had a similar spending programme in 1994–95, and also completed a £4 million investment programme to replace the weighbeams and renew the rails in July 1994. In the current financial year, Railtrack has doubled the painting budget.

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement indicating the reasons why Railtrack have delayed carrying out a comprehensive structural investigation of the Forth rail bridge. [1413]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack is currently carrying out the structural analysis of the bridge, as requested by the Health and Safety Executive. I understand that this analysis is taking slightly longer than planned, due to the complexity of the project.

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the current painting and maintenance arrangements for the Forth rail bridge; and to what extent these have been altered during the last year. [1257]

Mr. Watts: In July 1995, Railtrack appointed Amec to provide a construction management system ensuring the safe co-ordination of all contractors working on the structure of the bridge. Maintenance has since been organised into 17 distinct work packages and new contracts have been let accordingly. Painting is being carried out by the infrastructure maintenance unit Scotland of British Rail infrastructure services and by Wilkie Hooke.

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations his Department has received from the Health and Safety Executive relating to the delays in the publication of its report on the structural condition of the Forth rail bridge. [1253]

Mr. Watts: None.

Mr. Donohue: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department originally requested the Health and Safety Executive to publish its report on the structural condition of the Forth rail bridge; and what is the expected timetable for this project. [1255]

Mr. Watts: The Department agreed that the Health and Safety Executive should publish its report when the assessment was complete. I understand that HSE's original timetable has slipped slightly and that it now hopes to be able to publish its report early in the new year.

Rail Electrification Schemes

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the outstanding rail electrification schemes in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [1178]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack informs me that there are two outstanding electrification schemes on which implementation works are currently under way. They are Heathrow Express, and North London line electrification.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the total mileage of electrified railtrack in each of the last 20 years; what percentage of the network this represents; and if he will make a statement; [1177]

(2) what has been the increase in the electrification of the rail network in each of the last 20 years; what are the projected figures for the next five years; and if he would make a statement. [1179]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack informs me that approximately 30 per cent. of the 10,300 route miles in Britain are electrified using overhead and third rail systems. The other information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Nuclear Fuel Trains

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects Direct Rail Services Ltd. to begin taking over the running of irradiated nuclear fuel trains and whether its licences include the carriage of irradiated fuel which emanates from abroad. [1566]

Mr. Watts: I understand that Direct Rail Services Ltd. intends to begin running services as soon as its train operator's licence is granted. This will be dependent on the necessary pre-conditions being met, which must include a fully approved safety case. The origin of any irradiated fuel carried is not a rail licensing matter.

Motorways

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what responsibilities his Department has in respect of motorway developments and the publication of them to interested parties; and if he will make a statement; [1394]

(2) who is responsible for issuing statutory notices in connection with motorway changes. [1397]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. William O'Brien, dated 22 November 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what responsibilities his Department has in respect of motorway developments and the publication of them to interested parties; and if he will make a statement, and who is responsible for issuing statutory notices in connection with motorway changes.

The main statutory procedures for the development of road schemes are set out in the Highways Act 1980. The Agency is responsible for preparing motorway schemes in accordance with scheme briefs, targets and budgets from the Secretary of State. This includes publicity for schemes at their various stages, issuing statutory notices and publishing draft orders where appropriate.

Highways Agency

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date the former road programme director left the Highways Agency; if the severance terms included lump sum payments; and what subsequent applications under the business appointment rules have been received from him. [1104]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes dated 22 November 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question about what date the former Road Programme Director left the Highways Agency; if the severance terms included lump sum payments; and what subsequent applications under the business appointment rules have been received from him.

The former Road Programme Director left the Highways Agency on 30 April 1995. He received the normal severance terms, which included lump sum payments. The former Road Programme Director made an application under the business appointment rules to accept an appointment with the company Ove Arup and Partners, and this was approved following reference to the Cabinet Office and consultation with relevant trade associations.

Bicycling

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to encourage bicycling; and if he will make a statement. [1180]

Mr. Norris: Following the Government's statement of policy on cycling last year, we have taken a number of initiatives to encourage cycling. We are currently considering bids made under the cycle challenge competition, designed to bring forward new ideas and partnerships capable of widespread application in the United Kingdom. We have encouraged local highway authorities to give a higher profile to cycling within their transport policies and programme submissions, and we have indicated that we will take special account of package bids which include provision for cycling. We are supporting the development of the national cycle network, which will open up new route opportunities for recreational, tourist and utility cyclists alike. And we are making good progress in generating a national strategy for cycling which I hope will be complete by next summer.

WALES

Childhood Immunisation

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to review the rules regarding financial penalties imposed on general practitioners who have not met targets set for immunisation; and if he will make a statement. [547]

Mr. Richards: Childhood immunisation target payments were introduced to provide incentives for general practitioners to encourage and increase patient take-up of childhood vaccinations. The success of the immunisation programme has resulted in the incidence of childhood diseases being at their lowest-ever levels and I have no plans to review the criteria GPs have to meet in order to qualify for target payments.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1429]

Mr. Hague: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. There have been no cases in which certificates were used inter partes in proceedings.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid in accordance with agreed contractual conditions or within 30 days in each of the last five years; [1118]

(2) how many orders and firms are represented by the 5 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of these are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [941]

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [970]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Office publicises its payment policy in its annual departmental report, and on all official orders and contracts.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [918]

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested. However, once valid invoices are received by my finance division, they are all paid within seven working days.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce his final decision, on the sites to be acquired for development as bird compensation/mitigation measures, for the loss of Cardiff bay habitat following completion of barrage construction. [2212]

Mr. Hague: The Cardiff Bay development corporation, acting on the advice of the Countryside Council for Wales, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Land Authority for Wales, has submitted its report on alternative site options to the Goldcliff/Redwick proposals. I expect to announce my final decision on site acquisition and place a copy of the Cardiff Bay development corporation report in the Library of the House shortly, following detailed discussions with the European Commission and the Countryside Council for Wales.

Education

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he is likely to reach conclusions following consultation on "A Bright Future: Getting the Best for Every Pupil at School in Wales". [2213]

Mr. Hague: Comments were invited on how best to raise standards and make a success of the programme set out in "A Bright Future". Earlier today I indicated that the reaction has been heartening. It confirms that the achievements of higher standards in Welsh schools is both possible and necessary. There is a ready acceptance that targets for improvement should be set—school by school, as well as at the national level. I shall be publishing a commentary on all this shortly, to emphasise the significance of the programme and to affirm its contents.

In addition, "A Bright Future" consulted on a proposal that a specific target be set for Wales so that, by 2000, half of all individual 15-year-olds should get an A-C grade in each of GCSE mathematics, science, English or Welsh (first language). I can confirm this target. It will demand a significant uplift in performance annually; but even matching the progress of the last two years, in each of the next five would bring us within striking distance of the goal. It is important to measure the progress against a target expressing ambitions for what ought to be achieved. The target is for Wales as a whole, not for individual schools. I look to schools to set their own targets—where appropriate with the assistance of LEAs and others who can provide local support—to improve their performance year by year.

The independent school inspectorate is also working with schools to set new targets following inspections and it will monitor progress.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Further Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many full and part-time lecturing staff were employed in colleges of further education using funds provided by the Training and Employment Agency in each year since 1990; [1113]

(2) how much money has been provided by the Training and Employment Agency for the employment of lecturing staff in institutes of further and higher education in real and constant price terms. [114]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been passed to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 21 November 1995:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency, to reply to your question.

The Agency purchases training from approximately 160 training providers in Northern Ireland including the Colleges of Further Education. Since these colleges also provide training which is paid for from other sources, it is therefore not possible for the Agency to determine the number of full and part-time lecturing staff whose employment is directly or indirectly due to Agency funding.

The Training and Employment Agency does not itself employ lecturing staff in Colleges of Further Education and therefore cannot provide a meaningful response to your question.

I am sorry that I cannot be more helpful on this occasion.

Neighbour Disputes

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what priority the RUC places on dealing with disputes between neighbours; what resources it has in place in North Down to counteract this problem; and what discrete statistics it maintains to monitor the scale and growth of such disputes. [74]

Sir John Wheeler: The primary duty of a police officer is to serve the whole community and protect its citizens from all unlawful and harmful acts, from whatever source. The RUC places a high priority on investigating all breaches of the law, including disputes between neighbours.

Disputes between neighbours in the North Down area are given the same priority as elsewhere in the Province. Disputes of this kind are considered within the role of normal police duty and the police liaise with relevant agencies such as Northern Ireland Housing Executive, Department of the Environment or North Down Borough Council if the dispute relates to dogs or noise.

No discrete statistics are held relating to such disputes.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in each of the last five years; [1120]

(2) how many orders and firms are represented by the 5.3 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of these are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [940]

Sir John Wheeler: The information is not readily available in the format requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [963]

Sir John Wheeler: The Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments payment practices and performances are published in the departmental report. The Department of Agriculture also publishes its payment targets in the booklet "Our Service Standards".

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [925]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is not available in the Northern Ireland Office, the Department of Economic Development or the Department of Health and Social Services, excluding the Child Support Agency. The average length of time taken to make payments by the other four Northern Ireland Departments and the CSA ranges from 10 days to 20 days.

Students

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Northern Ireland students attend (a) English and Welsh, and (b) Scottish universities; and how many there are in each by academic specialism. [1219]

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	English and Welsh institutions	Scottish institutions
Medicine and Dentistry	304	386
Subjects Allied to Medicine	613	242
Biological Sciences	244	245
Veterinary Science	55	59
Agriculture and Related Subjects	155	84
Physical Sciences	344	199
Mathematical/Computer Sciences	1,129	573
Engineering and Technology	458	308
Architecture, Building and Planning	1,079	423
Social, Economic and Political Studies/Law	1,263	832
Business and Administrative Studies	351	232
Librarianship and Information Science	205	100
Languages	443	76
Humanities	591	105
Creative Arts	249	112
Education	398	453
Total	7,881	4,429

In addition, there were 2,556 Northern Ireland domiciled students studying with the Open university.

Exclusion Orders

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many exclusion orders have been (a) imposed, (b) revoked, (c) reimposed at the expiry of a previous order and (d) allowed to lapse in the last 12 months; [1220]

(2) how many exclusion orders made under the prevention of terrorism legislation are currently in force. [1221]

Sir John Wheeler: No exclusion orders have been imposed or reimposed by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in the past 12 months. All 10 outstanding exclusion orders for which he was responsible were revoked in February of this year.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Scratchcards

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what (a) complaints and (b) representations she has received about the sale of scratchcards to young people below the age of 16 years; and if she will make a statement. [422]

Mr. Sproat: I have received a number of representations about the national lottery. It is not possible to determine the number which have been about the sale of scratchcards to young people below the age of 16, without incurring disproportionate cost.

"Sport: Raising the Game"

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the total cost involved in the printing and publication of "Sport: Raising the Game". [1554]

Mr. Sproat: The total cost to the Department of National Heritage of the printing and publication of 70,000 copies of "Sport: Raising the Game" was £63,900.00.

A further 15,000 copies of the document were reprinted in October, at a cost of £19,500 to meet exceptional demand.

The cost of the distribution of the document to all schools, higher education and further education institutions and all local education authorities was approximately £28,000 and was met by the then Department for Education.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what advice has been sought by representatives of the media from Her Majesty's Government about problems associated with the destruction of the airliner Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie. [1629]

Mr. Sproat: I am not aware that any such advice has been sought from my Department.

British Library

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement regarding progress on the construction of the British library. [410]

Mr. Sproat: The building is being constructed in two phases—phase 1A and the completion phase. Phase 1A is largely complete, and work on the completion phase will continue into the last quarter of 1996. It is planned that the whole building will be completed toward the end of 1996.

Works of Art

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many acquisitions of works of art museums in England and Wales have purchased for each year since 1985; and what was their value in each year in constant prices. [193]

Mr. Sproat: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Purchase Grants (Museums)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what would be the present value of purchase grants for museums in England and Wales had the grants been uprated in line with inflation since 1985. [192]

Mr. Sproat: Until 1992–93, grant in aid allocations to national museums and galleries in England included a separate provision for purchases which had been kept constant since 1985. Since 1992–93, trustees of those institutions have been free to decide for themselves how much of their grant in aid should be devoted to purchases for their collections. The national museums and galleries of Wales still receives a differentiated grant in aid for running costs, building and maintenance work and purchases for the collection. Had the purchase grants for 1985–86 been increased exactly in line with the deflators for the gross domestic product, they would be as follows:

£ million

Institution	1995–96
British Museum	2.316
Imperial War Museum	0.159
National Gallery	4.362
Natural History Museum	0.301
National Maritime Museum	0.325
National Portrait Gallery	0.492
Science Museum	0.731
Tate Gallery	2.879
Victoria and Albert Museum	1.816
Wallace Collection	0.0
National Museum's and Galleries of Wales	1.757

Coronation Crown of Queen Adelaide

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will take steps to ensure the frame of the coronation crown of Queen Adelaide is classified as regalia and is not granted an export licence to the United States of America. [194]

Mr. Sproat: Following an objection to the issue of an export licence by my Department's expert adviser, the application to export the frame of the coronation crown of Queen Adelaide was referred, in the normal way, to the reviewing committee on the export of works of art. The reviewing committee consulted my Department, the Treasury Solicitor's Department and the Lord Chamberlain's Office on whether the crown frame constituted regalia. The reviewing committee was advised that the discarded crown frame could not be regarded as part of the regalia.

A decision on the export licence application has been deferred until after 24 January 1996 to give the opportunity for an offer to purchase the crown frame to be made at or above the fair market price of £425,000.

A summary of this case is contained in the annual report of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art 1994–95, which was placed in the Library of the House last 24 October. Decisions on the export licence applications for the frame of the imperial crown of George I and the frame of the coronation crown of George IV have also been deferred until after 24 January 1996 to enable purchase offers to be made.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the average length of time it takes for her Department to pay invoices. [926]

Mr. Sproat: The information requested is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost, but a sample of invoices received by the Department of National Heritage during this financial year shows that the average length of time for payment of invoices is currently 20 days.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many orders and firms are represented by the 9.4 per cent. of invoices not paid by her Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of those are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [916]

Mr. Sproat: The sample of invoices used in the calculation shows that the figure represents 90 orders and firms. Our records cannot be used to determine firms with fewer than 500 employees.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how her Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [962]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage publicises only payment practices as percentages of invoices paid within contract terms or 30 days. As required, these details of our annual payment performance are included in our departmental reports.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days or within agreed contractual provisions in each of the last five years. [1122]

Mr. Sproat: The information requested is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost, but the following has been produced on the basis of the sample of invoices received by the Department of National Heritage and used to reply to the hon. Member on 1 November, Official Report, column 267:

Amount owed £'000

1993–94: 246

1994–95: 753

1995–96: 166

There are no comparable departmental figures for earlier years as the Department's payment system was not in place until 1993, following the establishment of DNH in April 1992.

British Academy of Sport

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when her Department plans to publish proposals relating to the establishment of the new British academy of sport. [1469]

Mr. Sproat: I expect the Sports Council to publish a consultation paper on proposals for the British academy of sport on 5 December.

Television Rights (Football)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action her Department is planning to prevent any single broadcasting company having a monopoly on the rights to televise live domestic football. [1477]

Mr. Sproat: The Government have no plans to alter current arrangements under which, with the exception of listed sporting events which cannot be shown on a pay-per-view basis, sports rights holders are free to dispose of their rights to broadcast in the way they choose.

European Championship

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much money the Government have promised to help fund activities associated with the Euro-96 tournament. [1474]

Mr. Sproat: We have made available £400,000 for the cultural festival linked to Euro-96. We are also considering how National Music Day, which falls on the weekend of the championship finals, can be focused on associated cultural events.

Sporting Events (Broadcasting)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when her Department last examined the likely impact of digital technology on the broadcasting of sporting events; and what was the outcome. [1498]

Mr. Sproat: We have been looking carefully at this and many other issues as we have been developing our proposals for the regulatory framework for digital terrestrial television. Digital technology will mean that there will be more opportunities for the coverage of sport on television, providing greater access and choice for the viewer.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list (a) who in her Department has authority to issue public interest immunity certificates and (b) how many have been issued in each of the last five years, giving the reasons for each case. [1420]

Mr. Sproat: A claim of public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information would normally be made by the appropriate Minister.

Since my Department was established in April 1992, it has not issued any public interest immunity certificates.

Royal Palaces

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the cost to grant in aid of the occupied royal palaces in (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992 net of (i) the costs associated with the fire at Windsor and (ii) the costs of the exceptional work started at Windsor in 1987–88. [1321]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 November 1995]: Costs associated with the fire and costs of the exceptional work were given in my earlier reply on 31 October 1995, Official Report, column 185. The grant in aid net of these factors was:

1990–91: £19.93[1] million

1992–93: £15.53 million

[1] This figure assumes that expenditure on the exceptional work was the same in each of the five years 1986–87 to 1990–91. As stated in the earlier answer, figures for each year are not available.

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what estimate has been made of the cost of providing details of expenditure on the furnishing of directors' apartments in the occupied royal palaces in each year from 1982 to 1991; and how these costs have been arrived at. [1322]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 November 1995]: It is estimated that extraction of this information would cost about £2,000 in direct additional staff costs. File handling, transport and supervision could double that.

The PSA files have been put away in bulk. It seems from its lists that we would probably need to screen some 200 volumes to identify the right ones before we could extract and present the right information. Even then, we might not find the information in these files and might have to search further. The estimate was built up on the basis of time for each volume depending on how relevant it is found to be.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many times in the last year she has used (a) the London Underground and (b) London buses while on official business. [423]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Infrequently. Such records are not kept.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them.

Mr. Newton: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. No public interest immunity certificates have been issued by my Department in the last five years.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Underground and (b) London Transport buses while on official business.

Mr. Newton: None. However, the nature of my duties means that the overwhelming majority of my movements in London on official business are only between Whitehall and the House.

SCOTLAND

Motorway Crash Barriers

6. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many miles of dual carriageway and motorway there are in Scotland that do not have the protection of crash barriers. [776]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A total of 71 miles.

Munitions Dumping (South-west Scotland)

16. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the survey he has asked the Marine Laboratory to undertake off the coast of south-west Scotland. [787]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: A number of companies with specialist expertise in underwater exploration have contacted Scottish Office scientists to offer their assistance with the marine survey of the Beaufort's dyke area.

Local Government Services

17. Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to discuss the funding of local government services. [788]

Mr. Kynoch: On 19 January.

23. Mrs. Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet COSLA to discuss local government finances. [795]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Paisley, South, (Mr. McMaster).

Migration

18. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the number of individuals who moved residence from England to Scotland in the last year. [789]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is estimated that 47,000 individuals moved residence from England to Scotland in 1994.

Scottish Economy

19. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met with the chief executive of Scottish Enterprise to discuss the Scottish economy; and if he will make a statement. [790]

Mr. Kynoch: Last week.

National Health Service

20. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of health boards in Scotland to discuss the national health service. [792]

21. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of Grampian health board to discuss community hospital provision in the north-east. [793]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend and I meet health board chairmen regularly to discuss matters of current interest.

Tree Planting

22. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many trees have been planted by the forestry industry in the United Kingdom within each of the past five years. [794]

Mr. Kynoch: Over 70 million trees were planted in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

A92 (Accidents)

24. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the number of deaths, injuries, and accidents on the A92 Dundee, Arbroath to Montrose road in the current year to date; and if he will make a statement. [796]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Between 1 January and 31 October 1995, the latest date for which the requested statistics are available, there were five deaths and 30 other casualties arising from 60 accidents, including 39 non-injury accidents, on the A92 between Dundee and Montrose. This stretch of the A92 is a local road and responsibility for road safety on it rests with the local roads authority, Tayside regional council.

Departmental Staff

25. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will name all Scottish Office staff who are political appointments, the nature of their responsibilities and the cost to public funds of employing them. [797]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have two special advisers, Mr. Gerald Warner and Mrs. Jacqui Low. They assist me with that part of my work which is partly governmental and partly political. There is a nationally agreed salary range for special advisers; individuals are paid at a rate within that range which equates to salary in their previous employment.

Forestry Commission Woodland

26. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to increase the number of Forestry Commission woodlands to be held by local communities. [798]

Mr. Kynoch: We are currently considering how local communities can become more involved in the management of Forestry Commission woodlands.

Private Finance Initiative (NHS)

27. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the private finance in initiative in the national health service. [799]

Mr. Kynoch: Good progress is being made with the private finance imitative. A number of major schemes are now at advanced stages in the process and are due to come to fruition within the next few months. There is confidence among those taking these schemes forward that the PFI will offer considerable benefits to the NHS.

Under-age Drinking

28. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to reduce under-age drinking in public places in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [801]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Under-age drinking is a cause for concern in any context. The Health Education Board for Scotland continues to promote a range of materials aimed at educating young people about the risks of excessive or inappropriate drinking. We are also looking, together with other Government Departments, at what steps might be taken to address the problem of so-called designer alcoholic products associated with under-age drinking.

We are also concerned to reduce the problem of nuisance caused by people of any age drinking in public places and have invited local authorities to propose byelaws to address this by making it an offence to drink in designated public places. We have so far confirmed byelaws in six local authority areas. Many other authorities are in the process of preparing proposals.

Road Programmes

29. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet COSLA to discuss roads programmes. [802]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to meet COSLA specifically to discuss roads programmes.

Job Creation

30. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to promote job creation in the Border region; and if he will make a statement. [803]

Mr. Kynoch: Scottish Borders Enterprise, which has a budget of £9.6 million in 1995–96, has the main responsibility for promoting economic development in the Borders. The SBE acts in co-operation with local authorities and other economic development agencies.

Fisheries

31. Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation to discuss current problems of the fishing fleet; and if he will make a statement. [804]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: My right hon. Friend last met representatives of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation in Luxembourg on 26 October when, together with my hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, he represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Fisheries Ministers. The current problems facing the fishing fleet were fully discussed.

34. Mr. Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions his Department has had with MAFF concerning allegations that Scottish-based fishing vessels have been fishing illegally in the south-west mackerel box; and if he will make a statement. [808]

Mr. Robertson: The Scottish Office maintains close contact with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on fisheries issues. The mackerel box is kept under close surveillance by the Ministry's sea fisheries inspectorate. There is no evidence of illegal fishing by Scottish vessels operating in the box.

National Tree Week

32. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to support national tree week. [805]

Mr. Kynoch: The Government support tree planting every week of the year. Last year, we provided funds for the planting of over 70 million trees.

Infill Tax

33. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has met Scottish Power to discuss the consequences of the proposals to impose an infill tax on fly ash from coal-fired generating units in Scotland. [807]

Mr. Kynoch: In the course of a recent visit I made to Longannet power station, Scottish Power raised with me a number of issues including the implementation of the landfill tax proposal by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Departmental Staff (Duties)

35. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will review the work of civil servants in the Scottish Office in dealing with matters affecting the political party in government. [809]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The rules about civil servants participating in party political matters are clear and rigorously enforced. There is therefore no need for me to review the work of civil servants in the Scottish Office regarding such matters.

Historic Buildings (Restoration)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps is he taking to ensure there is an adequate supply of Scottish slate and other traditional building materials needed for the authentic restoration of Scotland's historic buildings. [195]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Since these are matters for Historic Scotland, I have asked the agency's chief executive, Mr. Graeme Munro, to write to the hon. Member as soon as possible. A copy of Mr. Munro's letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Letter from Graeme N. Munro to Mr. Gordon Prentice dated 22 November 1995:

I have been asked to reply to your question to the Secretary of State for Scotland on the steps being taken to ensure the continuing supply of Scottish slate and other traditional building materials for use on Scotland's historic buildings.

As you will appreciate, this is a topic which greatly concerns us in Historic Scotland and a considerable amount of work is presently being devoted to it. Where necessary, we are working in conjunction with colleagues in Scottish Enterprise and other organisations to address the issues involved.

To undertake effective conservation and the authentic restoration of Scotland's built heritage, it is critical that properly trained craftsmen have appropriate traditional building materials at their disposal. Through an integrated approach, Historic Scotland aims to encourage industry, material suppliers, and the education and training providers, to achieve this objective.

In 1993, Historic Scotland established a Technical Conservation, Research and Education Division. The Division is charged with the responsibility of conducting or commissioning research into technical conservation issues, developing skills relating to the built heritage, and raising the standard of conservation practice among owners, contractors, professional groups and craftsmen.

If we are successfully to encourage the revival of key supply industries there is a need to investigate the supply of traditional building materials. As a result, a number of related studies are currently underway.

To obtain a comprehensive overview of Scottish stone supplies, and their potential for use in future conservation and restoration projects, a strategic study has been commissioned. This will involve examining ways in which the Scottish stone industry might arrest the decline in the use of indigenous stone, and give pointers to how this trend might be reversed.

As no slate has been produced in Scotland since the early 1950s a major geological study into Scottish slate reserves has been commissioned from Glasgow University. A separate study by Dundee University will try to quantify the extent of change which has taken place through the use of alternative roof covering materials. Both studies aim to provide Historic Scotland with a strategic overview of the issues involved and with information which will assist decision makers and specifiers on the available, and future, potential for Scottish slate.

Over recent years there has been a steadily increasing awareness of the significant damage being caused to historic buildings as a result of the inappropriate use of cement in repair work. Whilst a number of Scottish outlets still produce lime, none of that is readily available for use in building conservation work. To assess the quality of what is to hand, Historic Scotland has commissioned a scientific analysis of lime from 15 locations around Scotland. This information will be used to encourage industry to restart lime burning and slaking. If successful, this will greatly enhance the ability of specifiers to choose the correct material to undertake sensitive repairs on the exterior and interior of historic buildings.

To assist in this process, Historic Scotland has recently published 3 relevant technical publications—

Preparation and Use of Lime Mortars—Technical Advice Note 1

Conservation of Plasterwork—Technical Advice Note 2

The Repair of Historic Buildings in Scotland

Supplementary publications, promoting the results of case studies into traditional lime harling and a Technical Advice Note on lime washing are also planned.

As part of the associated education process, Historic Scotland recently held a successful international conference on lime. This attracted 170 delegates, with representatives from 15 different countries and was warmly received by practitioners and industry representatives alike.

With a greater researched awareness of Scottish traditional building details has come a fuller understanding of the widespread use of earth and clay as an indigenous building material. Currently, Historic Scotland is researching this area with a view to producing a further technical publication. Our plan is that this should be launched at an international conference on the topic, due to be held at Dundee University in August 1996, in conjunction with the ICOMOS Out of Earth conference series.

A similar increasing understanding of the wide variety of natural materials used in traditional Scottish thatching techniques has steadily developed in recent years. Much of this information has been rediscovered as a result of grant-aiding the repair of thatched buildings around the country under Historic Scotland's Historic Building Repair Grant Scheme. Presently, research is underway to analyse the practical aspects of these projects, and to link this to an increased historic understanding. The intention is to produce a Technical Advice Note on Scottish Thatch and Thatching Techniques by the end of 1995 this year.

In taking a key role in the promotion of the need to use appropriate traditional materials, Historic Scotland is playing a major part through its Historic Buildings Repair Grant Scheme to pump prime the industry in this area. With repair and maintenance output in Scotland now amounting to over 40% of all construction spend in Scotland, this input has considerable influence. By promoting the results of its research programmes through publications, conferences, seminars and lectures, Historic Scotland also aims to take forward with industry, the professions, and the education and training providers, an integrated approach to the future development and use of Scottish traditional building materials.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Public interest immunity certificates are authorised and signed by my right hon. Friend.

In 1993, two certificates were signed. Each related to proceedings in the Court of Session raised by a prisoner against the Secretary of State for Scotland. Each certificate concerned matters of prison security. In one of the cases, the certificate was produced in the court proceedings.

In each of the other years, no certificates have been issued.

Skye Bridge (Tolls)

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will express the average toll charge per mile for a car in respect of the Skye bridge; and if he will make a statement. [237]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: [holding answer 21 November 1995]: The Skye crossing is approximately 1.5 miles long, of which the bridge itself is about 0.5 miles. A regular car user will pay £2.44 per crossing, equivalent to £1.63 mile. A car user at the non-discount price will pay £4.30 per crossing equivalent to £2.87 per mile. The tolls were fully discussed at the public local inquiry and are less than the pre-existing ferry fares.

NHS Staff Pay Rates

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what rate of pay increases have been negotiated for 1995–96 in respect of nurses and other employees subject to Whitley Council pay rates who are in the employment of Orkney health board and Shetland health board; and if he will make a statement [238]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 21 November 1995]: Hospital doctors and dentists were awarded increases of 2.5 per cent. with the facility for further increases to be negotiated locally for those in the consultant grade. These enhanced rates have been in payment since April 1995.

Agreement has recently been reached that nurses and all other staff employed by health boards, except general and senior managers, will be awarded a pay increase of 2.5 per cent. on national rates, backdated to 1 April 1995, with the opportunity for further increases to be negotiated locally.

These increases apply to all staff not employed in NHS trusts and form part of a package which has, I am pleased to say, brought an end to the dispute over the 1995 pay award to NHS staff.

Structural Funds

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide details of the distribution of EU objective 3 structural funding in Scotland in respect of (a) 1994 and (b) 1995 to date. [239]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 21 November 1995]: The amount claimed for 1994 by Scottish-based applicants is £46.3 million. This excludes a small amount of grant claimed for Scottish projects run by applicants based elsewhere in Great Britain.

For 1995, £45.3 million has so far been committed to Scottish projects. A further £1 million will be committed before the end of the calendar year.

Distribution of objective 3 moneys within Scotland, by area or agency, is not yet available.

Highlands and Islands Airports

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce his conclusions on the review of Highlands and Islands airports; if he intends to publish the consultants' report; and if he will make a statement. [226]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 21 November 1995]: The report by Quayle Munro has not yet been received and no conclusions have been reached.

No decision has been made on whether the report will be published.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [965]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Department's payment practices are publicised in the departmental report and the guide to suppliers wishing to do business with the Scottish Office—"Selling to The Scottish Office". The Department's standard terms and conditions of contract give details of payment terms and what action should be taken by suppliers on late payment of invoices. The booklet and standard terms and conditions are available on request.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [923]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In 1994–95 the Scottish Office paid suppliers on average 10 days from receipt of a valid invoice or the goods or services, whichever was the later.

This was the result of pursuing three objectives:

1. The aim of paying all suppliers within the period stipulated by the contract—normally, but not always, 30 days. This objective was met on 96 per cent. of payments in 1994–95.
2. The desirability of taking advantage of early settlement discounts where this makes good business sense.
3. The need to batch together payments covering several invoices in order to minimise the administrative costs of making payments.

Flooding (Clyde)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he holds on the impact of dredging policy and building on low-lying land on both sides of the Clyde on the likelihood of flooding; and if he will make that information available. [1225]

Mr. Kynoch: Developments on low-lying land adjacent to rivers face an inherent risk of flooding, however small. The assessment of this risk is primarily for developers and owners and a national planning policy guideline, planning and flooding, has been published to ensure that this is fully taken into account in the planning process. Strathclyde regional council, and the port authority jointly commissioned a study in 1988 of the possible effects of dredging operations reducing in line with the needs of the port. This concluded that this would have little effect on the risk of fluvial or tidal flooding but might lead to operational concerns for sewerage systems.

Tourism

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the state of the tourism industry in Scotland. [770]

Mr. Kynoch: Tourism is a major contributor to the Scottish economy. My right hon. Friend has made clear his commitment to the industry. I am pleased to say that all the signs are that the industry has done well in 1995. In the first seven months alone, tourism trips to Scotland from within the United Kingdom were up by 24 per cent. over the same period last year, bednights up 32 per cent. and spend up by 15 per cent. Overseas trips to the UK as a whole also rose substantially and I expect Scotland to show a similar position. This success is underpinned by substantial Scottish Office support for tourism, through the Scottish tourist board and the enterprise agencies. We intend to continue to support the industry in its efforts to become still more competitive.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what basis he will determine the allocation of borrowing consents to the new unitary authorities in 1996–97 and 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [778]

Mr. Kynoch: On the basis of relative needs and inherited legal commitments.

DEFENCE

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1432]

Mr. Soames: Ministers alone sign public interest immunity certificates in this Department. Since April 1992 the total number of PII certificates signed remains as stated in my answer of 16 October 1995 to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones), Official Report, columns 27–28. In the event, not all the certificates have been used. They cover a number of individual subjects, including the screening of certain members of the armed forces from the public at various criminal or civil proceedings and the protection of certain information from disclosure.

Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the extramural contractors to the chemical and biological defence establishment, Porton Down, have agreed to allow disclosure of their contractual relationship with CBDE, in line with CBDE's open government initiative. [1593]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 22 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking how many extramural contractors have agreed to allow disclosure of their contractual relationship with the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

Forty four of our extramural contractors have agreed to their contractual relationship with CBDE being disclosed to the public. They include university departments and industrial companies.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what specific measures have been implemented by the chemical and biological defence establishment to make it more open about its current activities. [1594]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 22 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking what specific measures have been implemented by the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment to make it more open about its current activities has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

CBDE places a high degree of importance on publicising the work it carries out to protect the UK Armed Forces from the threat presented by chemical and biological weapons. The staff at CBDE have always published the results of their work in technical journals and represented CBDE at scientific conferences. While it was an autonomous Next Steps Agency CBDE also provided four full Annual Reports and Accounts detailing its activities. These will continue in future under the auspices of DERA. In addition CBDE encourages visits from all interested parties and has welcomed members of parliament and representatives from local and district councils, schools, universities and the local and national media.

I hope this information is helpful.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [950]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The payment of the vast majority of the Department's bills and those of its agencies is a matter for the chief executive of the Defence Accounts Agency. The Defence Evaluation and Research Agency is responsible for paying its own bills. I have asked the chief executives of these agencies to reply.

Letter from P. J. Trevelyan to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 22 November 1995:

You asked the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. As Chief Executive of the Defence Accounts Agency I have been asked to reply.

All new MOD contractors receive a 'Prompt Payment Guide' and billing timetable from the Liverpool payment office. This booklet provides guidance on MOD payment procedures to help contractors submit bills correctly and therefore receive prompt payment. Contractors are invited to submit bills fortnightly in accordance with the timetable. Information about payment arrangements over Christmas and Easter is printed on the remittance advice notes which detail payments made. Details of payment schedules are also published widely throughout MOD.

Because the MOD payment targets are key targets for the Defence Accounts Agency they are published in the Agency's Corporate Plan. Performance against the targets is published in the Agency's Annual Report and the House of Commons Official Report. The agreed target for financial year 1995/96 is to pay 97% of bills within 11 days of receipt at Liverpool, and all within 30 days. Currently the 11 day target is being achieved, and 99.99% is being achieved for the 30 day target.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 22 November 1995:

You asked the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid. I am replying for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency.

Details of payment practices are included in the terms and conditions of contracts sent to suppliers. Additionally we are preparing a new booklet, to be published shortly, that is intended to assist companies in doing business with DERA. This will include a section on our bill paying policies.

I hope this is helpful.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [935]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The payment of the vast majority of the Department's bills and those of its agencies is a matter for the chief executive of the Defence Accounts Agency. The Defence Evaluation and Research Agency is responsible for paying its own bills. I have asked the chief executives of these agencies to reply.

Letter from P. J. Trevelyan to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 22 November 1995:

You asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. This matter falls to me, as Chief Executive of the Defence Accounts Agency for reply. This statistic is not recorded locally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

The statistics which are readily available to the Liverpool payment office go back two and a half years. During this time 99.99% of bills have been paid within 30 days of presentation of a valid invoice. The Liverpool payment office also measures its performance against a higher departmental standard of payment within 11 days of receipt of a valid invoice. It achieved its 1993/94 target of 96%, and its 1994/95 target of 97%. It has also achieved its 1995/96 target of 97% so far this financial year.

Some low value bills are paid locally throughout MOD, but information about these is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 22 November 1995:

You asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. I am replying for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency.

As I said in my earlier reply of 1 November 1995, virtually all validated invoices are paid within 9 days of being received by our bill paying section.

I hope this is helpful.

Mines

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's rationale underlying the procurement of the future anti-personnel scatterable mine; [1072]

(2) what is his Department's policy for replacing the Ranger scatterable anti-personnel mine system; [1071]

(3) what progress has been made on the future anti-personnel scatterable mine system; and when it is intended to replace the Ranger system. [1073]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 19 October 1995, Official Report, column 352.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence from which supplier his Department has decided to procure the vehicle-launched scatterable mine system. [1078]

Mr. Arbuthnot: A final decision has yet to be taken.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the current progress of the "mines in the new century" programme; [1070]

(2) what is the entry into service date for the Barmine replacement. [1075]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Current plans are to introduce a pattern anti-tank mine system—"mines in the new century"—that will replace the Barmine system in the first decade of the next century. However, we are currently considering our future requirements for this nature of weapon and no firm decisions have been taken. Any new mines introduced into service would have a self-neutralising or self-destruct capability and would fully meet the requirements of the international laws of armed conflict.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department intends to order the aimed controlled effect anti-tank mine. [1077]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We are currently engaged in a development programme with France and Germany for the aimed controlled effect anti-tank mine. A decision concerning a production order will be made at the end of this phase and in the light of our continuing review of requirements for anti-tank mines.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the British armed forces last deployed anti-personnel mines in a tactical role; if this minefield was marked; when was it neutralised; and by whom. [1069]

Mr. Soames: It is not our practice to comment on the operational deployment of mines. The armed forces use all mines responsibly and in accordance with the laws of armed conflict to minimise the danger both to civilians and our own forces. In particular, all minefields are recorded and they are marked when appropriate. Wherever practicable, the UK armed forces have cleared mines which they have laid, once they were no longer needed.

Arms Exports (Iraq)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what dates his Department was informed of contracts relating to (a) Project Babylon, (b) Baby Babylon and (c) super-gun propellant; and what was the response of his Department. [997]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the memorandum presented by the Ministry of Defence to the Trade and Industry Select Committee in February 1992, HC86-xv. These are matters which are under investigation by Sir Richard Scott's inquiry. It would not be appropriate for me to comment further until Sir Richard has reported.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times in the last year he used (a) the London Underground and (b) London Buses while on official business. [417]

Mr. Portillo: None on Ministry of Defence business.

Jordan Defence Package

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date his Department was made aware of allegations of fraud, involving (a) Royal Ordnance, (b) BMARC and (c) Astra in the Jordan defence package; and what response was made by his Department to these allegations. [1031]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Allegations of corruption involving Royal Ordnance and the Astra group of companies were made to the Ministry of Defence police in early 1990 and investigations began on 1 February 1990. They were not linked to the Jordan defence package. Any investigation into breaches of export control is a matter for HM Customs and Excise.

Harrier GR7

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Harrier GR7s are presently available in service to the RAF. [366]

Mr. Soames: The RAF's Harrier GR7 operational fleet comprises 45 aircraft establishment and two in-use reserve.

Private Finance Unit

Mr. John Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of the MOD private finance unit in the last year; and how many staff are employed in the unit. [52]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is expected that the cost of the MOD private finance unit will be about £240,000 in 1995–96. Seven staff are employed in the unit: five civil servants and two private sector appointees.

Operation Deliberate Force

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the (a) laser-guided bombs and (b) 1,000 lb free fall bombs dropped by the RAF during Operation Deliberate Force hit their targets; how many of each type of bomb hit each of the targets which were hit by RAF aircraft; and how many of each type of bomb failed to hit a target. [369]

Mr. Soames: The information is not available in the form requested. Nineteen targets were assigned to be attacked with laser-guided bombs, and 43 of the 48 bombs which were dropped are assessed to have been successful. All 19 targets were either destroyed or severely damaged. Eight targets were assigned to be attacked with 30 1,000 lb free-fall bombs, but it is more difficult to assess the success of these weapons as other NATO aircraft attacked the same targets. However, it is assessed that there were three direct hits.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the definition of hitting a target and the circular error probable for each of the types of munition used in Operation Deliberate Force. [370]

Mr. Soames: The definition of hitting a target varies with the objective of a mission, the type of weapon and the nature of the target. Information about the circular error probable for the weapons used in Operation Deliberate Force is classified.

Jaguar GR1B Aircraft

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Jaguar GR1B aircraft are presently available in service to the RAF. [364]

Mr. Soames: Seven Jaguar GR1B aircraft are currently in RAF service.

Royal Ordnance (Police)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what employer or contractual relationship exists between British Aerospace Royal Ordnance and the Ministry of Defence police. [988]

Mr. Soames: This matter is under review. The Ministry of Defence police are employed at five British Aerospace-owned Royal Ordnance plc sites. The greater part of the cost of their services is repaid to the Ministry by the company under the terms of an agreement made in 1985.

Racism

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent allegations of racism within the armed forces have been communicated to his Department; what action he has taken in respect of them; and if he will make a statement. [318]

Mr. Soames: Since 1 January 1995, three incidents of alleged racism have been reported in the Army and three in the Royal Air Force. Disciplinary action has been recommended in one case; the remaining five cases are still under investigation. There have been no cases reported in the Royal Navy.

Racial abuse or discrimination is not tolerated in the armed forces. Complaints of racial discrimination are investigated and, if proven, appropriate action is taken against the offenders.

A code of practice on race relations in the armed forces has been enforced throughout the services since December 1993.

International Military Services Ltd

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which members of his Department are on the board of International Military Services. [1022]

Mr. Arbuthnot: International Military Services Ltd. is a company wholly owned by the Secretary of State for Defence. No serving member of his Department is on the board of that company.

Low Flying

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if military aircraft are permitted to exceed the speed limits for the United Kingdom low flying system when within weapons range danger areas. [424]

Mr. Soames: No.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints about low flying have been received from the area formerly covered by the southern part of the Prestwick-Glasgow avoidance area since 7 November 1994. [1282]

Mr. Soames: My Department has received approximately 40 complaints and inquiries about military low flying since 7 November 1994 from the area formerly covered by the southern part of the Glasgow-Prestwick avoidance area.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the minimum permitted altitude for air combat manoeuvring raining over the United Kingdom. [1284]

Mr. Soames: The minimum permitted altitude for air combat manoeuvring training over the United Kingdom is 5,000 ft above ground level.

Former Yugoslavia

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British military personnel have been killed or wounded in the course of military operations in the former Yugoslavia; and how many of those casualties were as a result of blue on blue incidents relating to non-hostile troops. [1503]

Mr. Soames: Eighteen British service personnel have been killed and a further 39 have sustained serious injuries in the course of military operations in the former Yugoslavia None of these casualties resulted from "blue on blue" incidents.

RAF (Total Quality Management)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to introduce the total quality management system to Royal Air Force flying operations. [1278]

Mr. Soames: The RAF continually strives for excellence in all its flying operations, and in doing so embraces and keeps under review relevant aspects of the philosophy associated with total quality management systems.

Danger Areas

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the military activities permitted in each of the danger areas D411, D509, D606, D608 and D609. [1302]

Mr. Soames: The danger areas specified are used for the following purposes:

Danger Area	Location	Usage
D411	Port Patrick	Trials of Sonobuoy Equipment
D509	Campbeltown	Anti-Air and Surface Shoots
D606	Forth Area	Live Anti-Submarine Warfare Depth Charge and Mortar firings
D607	Forth Middle	Surface firings; sleeve shoots; radar trials and air to air firings
D608	Forth Outer	Surface firings; sleeve shoots; radar trials and air to air firings
D609	St. Andrews	Radar training buoy

Trident

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research is being undertaken into the feasibility of adapting the Trident system to carry conventionally armed missiles; and what has been the expenditure on this research in the last three years. [1291]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The UK has conducted no such research.

Sliac Air Base, Slovakia

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom personnel visited Sliac air base in Slovakia in September 1995. [1307]

Mr. Soames: Two United Kingdom service personnel visited the Sliac air base in September 1995, under the auspices of the Vienna document of 1994.

Exercise Purple Star

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on plans for Exercise Purple Star in 1996. [1299]

Mr. Soames: This exercise will take place in spring next year on the eastern seaboard of America. It is the UK's major field training exercise for 1996 and involves over 15,000 personnel from all three services.

RAF (Self-authorising Status)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions are given to Royal Air Force commanders concerning the frequency with which the self-authorising status of aircrew under their command must be reviewed; and what formal examination or test is conducted to assess the suitability of aircrew to retain self-authorising status. [1279]

Mr. Soames: The self-authorising status of aircrew is approved by the station commander of each flying unit. There are no specific instructions concerning the frequency with which this must be reviewed, nor is any formal test conducted specifically to assess the aircrew's suitability to retain the status. However, all aircrew undergo a continual assessment of their ability to perform their duties including, where appropriate, their suitability to retain self-authorising status.

Nuclear Weapons Safety Adviser

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the work of the nuclear weapons safety adviser since his appointment. [1567]

Mr. Soames: Details of the nuclear weapons safety adviser's current and planned programme of work have been provided to the Select Committee on Defence and are contained in its 1995 report on progress of the Trident programme, pages 24 and 25, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Chemical and Biological Defence Agreements

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library copies of the annexes which have been added to the 1980 memorandum of understanding on chemical and biological defence between the United States of America, the United Kingdom and Canada in November 1988, October 1989, October 1991 and June 1994. [1584]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is not our practice to place copies of memoranda of understanding or their annexes in the Library.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what dates amendments to the 1980 memorandum of understanding on chemical and biological defence between the United States of America, the United Kingdom and Canada were first notified to Parliament; and on what date the memorandum was last amended. [1585]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is not our practice routinely to notify amendments to memoranda of understanding to Parliament. The memorandum of understanding on chemical and biological defence between the United States of America, the United Kingdom and Canada was last amended on 21 November 1994.

Flying Training, Slovakia

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what communications he has received from the Slovak authorities concerning the use of Slovak airspace for Royal Air Force training; and what response he has made to the Slovak authorities. [1306]

Mr. Soames: None since the meeting in February 1995 between my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for Defence and the Slovakian Defence Minister, referred to in my answer of 8 March to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond), Official Report, column 254. However, we continue to explore with the Slovak authorities military training opportunities for the United Kingdom in the region.

Overseas Training Costs

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the additional cost to the defence budget, other than direct payments to the Canadian authorities, of training Tornado crews at Canadian forces base, Goose Bay in each year since 1990. [1310]

Mr. Soames: The total costs in £millions of running the RAF unit at CFB Goose Bay since 1991 are in the table. Figures for 1990 are not readily available.

Year	RAF unit running cost
1991–92	2.096
1992–93	2.456
1993–94	3.103
1994–95	3.453
1995–96	3.292

Any other costs to the defence budget, other than direct payments to the Canadian authorities, are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what payments have been made to the United States and Canadian authorities for Royal Air Force use of training facilities centred on (a) Nellis air force base, Nevada, (b) Cold Lake, Alberta and (c) Eielson air force base, Alaska, in each year since 1990. [1309]

Mr. Soames: Payments to the United States authorities for use of training facilities at Nellis air force base, Nevada and Eielson air force base, Alaska are as follows:

	Nellis $	Eielson $
FY 1991–92	25,000.00	—
FY 1992–93	111,684.65	143,175.75
FY 1993–94[1]	365,609.92	354,308.33
FY 1994–95[1]	462,127.82	907,402.00
FY 1995–96[1]	130,441.85	417,011.43

[1] Because of US billing procedures, the accounts for these years remain open and further payments may be made against them.

The figures for 1990–91 are no longer available for either of the US locations, nor are the 1991–92 figures for Eielson air force base. No payments have been made to the Canadian authorities for use of training facilities at Cold Lake, Alberta.

British American Community Relations Committees

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the functions and budgets of the Anglo/Scottish/Welsh-American community relations committees; what is the current membership of each; and what is the process by which individuals are appointed to these bodies. [1297]

Mr. Soames: The function of these committees, now known as British American community relations committees, is to promote friendship and understanding between the US service personnel and civilian components, their dependants, and the British communities amongst whom they live. The only cost to the Department of these committees are certain out-of-pocket expenses for chairmen and administrative support provided by MOD-employed community relations advisers. Membership of the committees includes a chairman, who is appointed by my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, the US commander who acts as co-chairman, and, where applicable, a community relations adviser and an RAF commander. Also serving on the committees are a number of British civilians and US service personnel, selected by the chairman and co-chairman respectively.

Area Defence Weapon

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the area defence weapon is due to enter service. [1074]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Current plans are to introduce an area defence weapon in the first decade of the next century. However, we are currently considering our future requirements for this nature of weapon and no firm decisions have been taken. Any such weapon introduced into service would have a self-destruct or self-neutralising capability and would fully meet the requirements of the international laws of armed conflict.

Multiple-Launch Rockets

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the multiple-launch rocket system phase 2 warheads, ordered by Germany in August 1991, are due to be delivered to his Department. [1076]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The British Army is currently taking delivery of the multiple launch rocket system phase 2—AT2—rocket ordered by Germany and the United Kingdom in August 1991. Deliveries of the United Kingdom's offtake of phase 2 rockets are planned to be completed in early 1996.

Empty Dwellings

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many dwellings owned by his Department are currently unoccupied in the counties of (a) Hampshire, (b) Lancashire and (c) Avon; and how many dwellings owned by his Department have been unoccupied for six months or more in each of these counties. [1222]

Mr. Soames: As at 30 September 1995, my Department owned the following empty dwellings in the counties named:

Hampshire: 1,152

Lancashire: 25

Avon: 93

Information on properties unoccupied for six months or more is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many dwellings owned by his Department are currently unoccupied; and how many dwellings owned by his Department have been occupied for six months or more. [1336]

Mr. Soames: As at 30 September 1995, my Department owned 14,098 vacant dwellings, of which 13,898 were service families quarters and 200 were MOD civilian houses. Of these, 3,202 vacant service quarters and 55 civilian houses were in the process of being sold. The majority of the remainder of the service quarters were either awaiting major maintenance work, held for unit deployments, already allocated to service families due to move in shortly or formed part of the management margin needed to ensure that accommodation is available to house entitled service personnel. The majority of the vacant civilian houses could not be disposed of for security reasons. Information on properties unoccupied for six months or more is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

From the total of 13,898 empty properties, a further number of houses is being identified for future disposal.

European Procurement Co-operation

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to discuss European procurement collaboration with his French and German colleagues; and if he will make a statement. [1340]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Discussions continue with my French and German colleagues in a variety of forums, both on specific projects and on general European equipment collaboration issues. In particular, my Department is currently involved in discussions on the possible establishment of a European armaments agency and on the prospects for participation by the UK in the planned Franco-German armaments co-operation structure.

Arcadia Land Plc

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Arcadia Land company has expressed an interest in being involved in the privatisation or sale of surplus defence married quarters; and if he will make a statement. [1341]

Mr. Soames: Dr. David Hart, the independent adviser to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, is a director of Arcadia Land plc. As I made clear in my answer of 27 January, Official Report, column 445, no independent adviser assisting in the way ahead in a transfer of ownership of the married quarters estate will be permitted to have a financial stake in the outcome of the transaction. Arcadia Land plc has not made any expression of interest in respect of the disposal of surplus married quarters under the existing system.

Army Pay

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost to the public funds per annum for each member of the British Army. [1646]

Mr. Soames: This information can be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, it is possible to quantify the Regular Army's current annual pay bill on an average basis. Including all members of the home service full-time element of the Royal Irish Regiment and the non-regular permanent staff of the Territorial Army, the figure for pay, earnings-related national insurance contributions, allowances and superannuation equates to £23,300 per person. This figure takes no account of variation attributable to rank or other factors and costs.

Ballistic Missiles

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the feasibility study by the Defence Research Agency into a domestically produced ballistic missile interceptor; and if he will make a statement. [1647]

Mr. Arbuthnot: No. The Defence Research Agency is carrying out work related to ballistic missile defence. Its reports are classified and it would not be appropriate to publish them.

Ministry of Defence Police

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will publish the results of his Department's study into the future of the Ministry of Defence police; [1648]

(2) what estimate he has made of the numbers to be employed in the Ministry of Defence police in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement. [1649]

Mr. Soames: The overall manpower requirements of the Ministry of Defence police are kept under constant review. We will shortly be consulting the staff associations and trade unions concerned about proposals resulting from a number of studies on defence police and guarding requirements. Consultative documents will be put to them. I shall be sending copies to the House of Commons Defence Committee and to the hon. Members with particular consistency interests. I shall also place copies in the Library of the House.

Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Government plan at the appropriate time to make available to the public details of the declaration to the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons. [1608]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Yes. Details of UK's declarations required under the chemical weapons convention will be made available to the public when they are passed to the Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Student Loans

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average debt of students on completion of their studies. [181]

Mr. Forth: The appropriate average debt to the Student Loans Company of borrowers who entered repayment status on 1 April 1995 was £1,415.

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to use the national insurance system to collect repayments of student loans. [1466]

Mr. Forth: The Government have no plans to use the national insurance system for this purpose.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the financial institutions with which her Department has had discussions regarding reforms of the student loans scheme; and which of these has indicted interest in involvement in any new scheme. [1465]

Mr. Forth: Officials have had, and are continuing to have, discussions with a number of banks and building societies on this subject. Given the commercial nature of these discussions, it is not appropriate to say, at this stage, which institutions officials are talking to, nor which have expressed an interest.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will estimate for each year since 1992 in constant prices the average level of indebtedness of university and college students; and if she will make a statement. [628]

Mr. Forth: Information on total student indebtedness is not collected centrally.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list all those in her Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1391]

Mr. Forth: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister.

There was one case in 1991 and one in 1992 in which a certificate was used inter partes in proceedings.

The certificates were issued in respect of advice by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools and officials in the context of appeals under section 8(6) of the Education Act 1981 in order to protect the confidentiality of full and frank advice given to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Youth Training (Accidents)

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many accidents and fatalities have occurred involving people placed on youth training schemes each year since youth training began in 1983. [977]

Mr. Paice: The following table gives the total GB fatal, major and minor accident figures for youth training and its predecessor programme6s from 1983–84 to 1994–95.

Total youth training accident statistics (GB) from 1983–84 to 1994–95

	Fatal	Major	Minor
1983–84	4	100	843
1984–85	5	184	1,748
1985–86	2	222	1,913
1986–87	12	326	1,761
1987–88	8	509	2,541
1988–89	8	573	2,729
1989–90	4	548	2,495
1990–91	4	457	1,925
1991–92	2	344	1,597
1992–93	1	290	1,362
1993–94	4	287	1,579
1994–95	1	283	1,473

Notes:
1. Department for Education and Employment figures for youth trainees are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive for employed persons. However, the Department's figures include a number of accidents to trainees in educational establishments and road traffic accidents which would not have been reportable to HSE had the individuals been employed.
2. Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrence Regulations 1985 (RIDDOR).
3. The former "Youth Training Scheme" commenced in April 1983 and was succeeded by Youth Training in April 1990.

School Inspections

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what reimbursement is made to schools whose teachers spend time away from their own school while undertaking Ofsted school inspections elsewhere. [22]

Mr. Robin Squire: These are matters for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, who heads the Office for Standards in Education. I have asked Mr. Chris Woodhead to write to the hon. Member.

Higher Education Contribution Scheme

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make an assessment of the Australian Government's higher education contribution scheme. [1582]

Mr. Forth: This Australian scheme requires students in higher education to contribute to the cost of their tuition at university either through cash payments during their study or through repayments over time after graduation.

Physical Education Teachers

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her estimate of the number of physical education teachers who have been made redundant since 1992. [1470]

Mr. Robin Squire: Data on which to base such an estimate are not available.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to what proportion of places in existing private schools it is her policy to extend the assisted places scheme. [1626]

Mrs. Gillan: We will shortly be announcing our detailed plans for expanding the assisted places scheme, including arrangements for inviting eligible schools to bid for new places.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many orders and firms are represented by the 5 per cent. of invoices not paid by her Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of these are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees. [942]

Mr. Forth: A total of 6,419 invoices were sampled in four separate prompt payment of bills exercises during 1994–95. The result showed that 332 of these invoices were paid late—5 per cent. of the sample. The Department does not hold information on the number of employees in the companies involved.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days in each of the last five years. [1079]

Mr. Forth: The Department does not maintain separate records of the sums involved when invoices were not paid within 30 days. The information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how her Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [955]

Mr. Forth: The Department publicises information on its prompt payment performance in the departmental report. The Department's contracts branch, leading buying units and purchasing sections, when negotiating contracts, inform suppliers of goods and services of the standard payment terms including the complaint procedure when negotiating contracts if the Department fails to pay on time.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average length of time it takes for her Department to pay invoices. [933]

Mr. Forth: The Department does not have statistical information on the average time taken for the payment of invoices. Under an internal service level agreement, invoices are processed within five working days of receipt by the finance directorate. The Department is committed to meeting the objective of the Confederation of British Industry's prompt payment code to pay all valid invoices within 30 days of their receipt.

Staffing

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many staff her Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region: what is the cost of running these regional operations: what is the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which each budget is used. [267]

Mr. Paice: The information is not available in the form requested. The new Department for Education and Employment was created on 5 July 1995. The following information relates to the current financial year.

Table 1 gives the information requested for Department for Education and Employment staff working in, and budgets delivered through, Government offices for the regions.

Table 1: Government offices

Region	Staff in Post[1]	Running Costs[2] £ million	Programme Budgets[2] £ million
South east	54.5	2.2	174.9
London	68	3.2	215.1
Eastern	46.5	1.9	138.5
South west	59.5	2.1	136.7
West Midlands	71.5	2.6	174.2
East Midlands	55.6	1.8	134.4
Yorkshire and Humberside	64.6	2.2	197.7
Merseyside	41	1.4	212.3
North west	78.5	2.9	88.6
North east	62	2.1	146.7

Notes:
[1] As at 1 November 1995.
[2] Provision for 1995–96.

The main purposes for which these budgets are used are adult and youth training programmes, vocational education programmes and the provision of careers advice.

Table 2 gives information for the Employment Service. The ES has different regional boundaries to the Government office network.

Table 2: Employment services

Region	Staff in Post[1]	Running Costs[2] £ million	Programme Budgets[2] £ million
Northern	2,228	46.3	8.9
Yorkshire and Humberside	3,420	68.6	12.6
East Midlands and eastern	3,520	72.4	14.1
London and South east	11,652	265.8	56.1
South west	3,131	64.6	12.4
West Midlands	3,564	75.1	15.8
North west	4,798	99.2	19.8

Notes:
[1] As at 1 April 1995.
[2] Provision for 1995–96.

The main purposes for which these budgets are used are on employment measures to help people into work, placement and advisory services, employment services for people with disabilities and administering the payment of unemployment benefit.

The Department carries out its headquarters functions in London, Darlington, Sheffield and Runcorn.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the members of the board for each TEC stating which members have experience of running small businesses. [948]

Mr. Paice: A list showing private sector board members of each English TEC, and approximate company size, has been placed in the Library. Where the employee figure is shown as 0, the information has not been collected. No information is held about the experience of board members prior to joining their current company.

A complete list of all TEC board members is held in the Library. It is updated quarterly.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money each TEC earmarked in each of the last five years for small businesses. [943]

Mr. Page: I have been asked to reply.

Information on how much money each TEC earmarked in each of the last five years for small firms is not available centrally. This is because the funding which TECs use to support small businesses comes from a number of different sources including their own surpluses. Government funding for small businesses is available through TECs and business links from the DTI, Departments for Education and Employment and Environment and TECs can also draw on European funds to assist small firms.

Placing Assessment and Counselling Teams

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the main locations of the placing assessment and counselling teams which provide employment and advisory services for employers and people with disabilities in Scotland. [298]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. James Wallace, dated 22 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the main locations of the Placing Assessment and Counselling Teams (PACT) in Scotland.

A list of PACTs in Scotland is attached (Annex A). Orkney and Shetland are covered by the Highlands, Islands and Grampian PACT, each of which has an identified Employment Service member of staff who offers support to disabled people in Jobcentres in Kirkwall and Lerwick. In addition, full time Disability Employment Advisors based in Aberdeen visit employers and clients on the islands.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what information she has on the number of people in (a) Orkney and (b) Shetland who have made contact through their local job centre with the placing assessment and counselling teams in each year since the establishment of PACTs in 1992. [299]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. James Wallace, dated 22 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the number of people in Orkney and Shetland who have made contact through their local Jobcentre with the Placing Assessment and Counselling Teams (PACTs).

We do not record the number of people referred by Jobcentres to PACTs. However we do record the number of people, who need and may benefit from specialist help, who are assessed by PACTs.

Assessment is the process through which PACTs help disabled job seekers identify potential occupation or training establish whether they are job-ready, or need further preparation for work. Its purpose is to identify employment potential and needs, and to come to agreement about how to meet the individual needs of clients. It is based mainly on Employment Service (ES) provision supplemented by small numbers of external contracts. An individual action plan is agreed between the client and the ES setting out what work or training a client will look for and include any preparatory action they will need to take.

All clients referred to PACTs have an in-depth assessment interview or interviews with a Disability Employment Adviser (DEA). If this does not result in their being able to identify a suitable occupation or training, they may then be offered additional practical methods to help them decide. This can include functional testing, psychometric testing, an interview with an occupational psychologist or provided with enhanced assessment from specialist contractors.

From the first full year after they were introduced, the number of people assessed by PACTs on Orkney and Shetland were 122 for the 12 months to April 1994 and 156 for the same period to April 1995. The number of people assessed for the first six months of the current financial year was 108. As the introduction of PACTs was a gradual process, the numbers of assessments for 1992/93 were not recorded.

I hope this is helpful.

Kirklees Local Education Authority

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much was spent in total on school education in Kirklees in each year since 1974 at constant prices. [1337]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following table shows, at 1993–94 prices, the expenditure on pre-primary, primary and secondary education by Kirklees local education authority from 1974–75 to 1993–94, the latest year for which figures are available. These figures have not been adjusted for any changes of function.

Kirklees: Gross expenditure on school education 1993–94 prices

1993–94	174.98

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will set out the changes in real terms for education spending for each sector in Kirklees since 1980. [1339]

Mr. Squire: The increase in expenditure by Kirklees local education authority on pre-primary and primary education and secondary education, between 1979–80 and 1993–94, the latest year for which outturn figures are available, is as follows.

Kirklees LEA: Net recurrent expenditure, real terms

Year	Pre-Primary and Primary Education £000	Secondary Education £000
1979–80	37,756	46,029
1993–94	63,921	62,046

Unemployment, Durham

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people under the age of 25 years in the City of Durham constituency are unemployed and are in receipt of benefit; and how many of these are long-term unemployed. [156]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

In October 1995, there were 937 people aged under 25-year-old claiming unemployment-related benefits—unemployment benefit, income support or national insurance credits. Of these, 168 had been unemployed for over one year.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the (a) median, (b) highest and (c) lowest decile earnings of full-time workers on adult rates, distinguishing between male and female and manual and non-manual, in (i) Yorkshire and Humberside, (ii) the north of England and (iii) the United Kingdom in each year since 1993. [1459]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

Information on the median, quartiles and deciles of weekly and hourly earnings of full-time workers in the regions of Great Britain is shown in table 116 of part E of the new earnings survey reports. Copies of these reports are available in the Library.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the current average earnings of part-time workers on adult rates, distinguishing between manual and non-manual in (a) Yorkshire and Humberside, (b) West Yorkshire, (c) South Yorkshire, (d) North Yorkshire, (e) Humberside, (f) the north of England and (g) the United Kingdom. [1457]

Mrs. Knight: I have been asked to reply.

Information available from the new earnings survey is provided in the following table.

Average Weekly Earnings for part-time workers on adult rates, pay not affected by absence

Region	Non manual £	Manual £
Yorkshire and Humberside	112.50	78.70
West Yorkshire	117.80	79.90

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is (a) the number and (b) the proportion of (i) manual part-time workers and (ii) non-manual part-time workers broken down into men and women working less than eight hours a week and 16 hours a week. [1487]

Mrs. Knight: I have been asked to reply.

Estimates from the labour force survey are shown in the table.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Offals

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the State Veterinary Service's surveillance of the handling of special bovine offals in September and October; and if he will make a statement. [2310]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In September, the State Veterinary Service reported unannounced visits to 193 slaughterhouses and found failings in the handling of specified bovine offals in 92 to 48 per cent.—of them. In October the SVS reported visits to 153 slaughterhouses and found failings in 52 to 34 per cent. Many of the failings found were of a comparatively mild nature, for example reflecting teething troubles with the new stain. There were, however, some more serious problems, for example with the poor separation and storage of SBO material. This risks such material becoming mixed with other waste products which can then enter the animal feed chain. In the most serious cases we found small pieces of spinal cord, ranging in size from 1 cm to one third of the spinal cord, left attached to the carcases after dressing. So far, we have found 17 such instances, including one found during preliminary visits in the summer and five found up to 10 November and one on 20 November in the latest round of visits. Although in each instance the spinal cord was removed before the carcases left the premises, these were potentially serious failings. It is essential that we eliminate any prospect of SBO material entering the human food chain.

I view this most seriously and have therefore taken a number of steps to ensure that slaughterhouses fully comply with the requirements of the Specified Bovine Offal Order 1995. First, I have discussed the situation with the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service and he will ensure that his staff enforce the requirements of the order most rigorously. Secondly, where it has sufficient evidence, the Meat Hygiene Service will prosecute any slaughterhouse operator failing to meet his obligations under the SBO order. A number of prosecutions are already under consideration. Thirdly, I have asked the SVS to double the frequency of its unannounced surveillance visits to cattle slaughterhouses and head boning plants. Finally, I met representatives of slaughterhouse operators on 9 November to impress on them the need for full compliance with these controls. They assured me of their commitment to seeing the requirements fully met, and I welcomed their constructive response.

The SVS also visits knackeries and hunt kennels to monitor their compliance with the SBO controls. In September, it made unannounced visits to 212 such premises and found failings in the handling of SBOs in 137 of them—65 per cent. In October, the SVS visited 235 hunt kennels and knackeries and found failings in 70 to 29 per cent. Again, many of the failings found were of a comparatively mild nature. Hunt kennels and knackeries do not handle meat for human consumption; nevertheless, failings in the handling of SBOs at such premises could result in such material entering the animal feed chain. This is of concern. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary has, therefore, met representatives of hunt kennels and knackeries to impress on them too the need to comply fully with the controls on SBOs. She welcomed the constructive response from the respective representative organisations.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which bovine tissues are known to transmit BSE infectivity and at what stages in the animal's life they are infectious; and if he will make a statement. [2311]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A large number of tissues from cattle known to be naturally infected with BSE have been tested to determine whether they can transmit disease when inoculated intra-cerebrally and intra-peritoneally into susceptible strains of mice. Recent results have shown that two further tissues, the retina and the terminal spinal cord, can transmit BSE infectivity to mice, as well as those tissues already identified that can contain BSE infectivity, the brain and the cervical spinal cord. Infectivity had also been detected in the distal ileum of calces which has been experimentally challenged with BSE; this was first announced in an answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) by my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) on 30 June 1994, Official Report, column 657–58. These new findings do not require any changes to the regulations concerning BSE. Both the retina and terminal spinal cord are already covered by the Specified Bovine Offal Order 1995. They have to be removed from all cattle over six months at slaughter and are destroyed. Such tissues are thereby prevented from entering the human and animal food chains.

In addition to the above tissues, a large number of other tissues from cattle affected with BSE have been tested to see if they can transmit the disease to mice. Tests on the following tissues have been negative:

- Abomasum
- Bone marrow
- Buffy coat
- Cauda equina
- Cerebrospinal fluid
- Clotted blood
- Distal colon
- Proximal colon
- Epididymis
- Foetal calf blood
- Heart
- Distal small intestine
- Proximal small intestine
- Liver
- Lung
- Kidney
- Lymph nodes:
  - Prefemoral
  - Mesenteric
  - Retropharyngeal
  - Supramammary
- Midrum fat
- Milk
- Muscles:
  - Musculus (M.) semitendinosus

M. diaphragma
M. longissimus
M. masseter
Oesophagus
Omasum
Pancreas
Peripheral nerves:
N. splanchnic
N. sciaticus (proximal)
N. tibialis
Placental cotyledon
Placental fluids:
Allantoic fluid
Amniotic fluid
Prostate
Rectum
Reticulum
Rumen (oesophageal groove)
Rumen (pillar)
Semen
Seminal vesicle
Serum
Skin
Spleen
Testis
Tonsil
Udder
Uterine caruncle (pregnant cow)

We are also carrying out experiments to look at the way in which infectivity develops in different tissues over time. Four-month-old calves were fed infected brain from cattle with BSE. Animals were slaughtered at intervals subsequently and a large number of their tissues tested on each occasion to see if they could transmit the disease in mice. Animals developed clinical signs of BSE from 35 months after challenge onwards.

So far, we have obtained complete results on the tissue assays of animals slaughtered at two, six, 10 and 14 months after challenge. At two months, no tissue showed infectivity. From six months onwards the distal ileum—part of the small intestine—shows BSE infectivity. No other tissue tested, including the brain, spinal cord and thymus, has shown any infectivity in animals up to 14 months after challenge. Infectivity has also been detected in the ileum of animals killed 18 months after challenge, but assays of other tissues from these cattle are not yet complete.

These results support the existing precautionary controls on specified bovine offals. These require the intestines and thymus to be removed from all animals on slaughter and be destroyed. The brain, spinal cord, spleen and tonsils have to be removed from all cattle over six months old on slaughter and destroyed.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many United Kingdom farms have had at least one case of BSE. [1520]

Mr. Hogg: A total of 34,064 farms have had at least one case of BSE.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of BSE were confirmed in the United Kingdom in each year from 1986 to the latest available date. [1522]

Mr. Hogg: Bovine spongiform encephalopathy was first identified in November 1986. Information on the incidence of the disease prior to this date is not recorded.

The following is a table of the number of confirmed cases of BSE in the United Kingdom up to 17 November 1995. The cases prior to 21 June 1988 in Great Britain and 29 November 1988 in Northern Ireland when the disease was made notifiable, are recorded by year of clinical onset of disease and the cases thereafter are recorded by year of restriction.

Year	Number
1986	7
1987	435
1988 (pre-notification)	286
1988 (post-notification)	2,187
1989	7,166
1990	14,294
1991	25,202
1992	37,057
1993	34,830
1994	24,289
1995	11,031

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, what percentage of (a) United Kingdom dairy herds, (b) United Kingdom beef suckler herds and (c) total United Kingdom herds have experienced at least one case of BSE. [1519]

Mr. Hogg: As at 17 November 1995, 50.5 per cent. of United Kingdom dairy herds and 12.6 per cent. of beef herds have experienced at least one case of BSE. 29.5 per cent. of the total United Kingdom herds have experienced at least one case of BSE.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money was spent by the Government in respect of BSE on (a) research, (b) slaughter, (c) compensation and (d) disposal of carcases in (i) 1993, (ii) 1994 and (iii) 1995 to the latest available date. [1521]

Mr. Hogg: The following table shows the amount spent in respect of compensation and disposal for the financial years 1993–1994, 1994–95, and 1995–96 up to 31 October 1995. It is not possible without disproportionate cost to calculate slaughter costs separate from the other costs of field work by the State Veterinary Service. Euthanasia is predominantly carried out by veterinary officers who are already present on farm for the purpose of carrying out clinical examination of suspects, although occasionally it may require a separate visit.

Years	Compensation	Disposal
1993–94	37,468,085	8,753,603
1994–95	20,138,239	5,552,494
1995–96	6,012,476	1,952,019

Includes estimates for Northern Ireland.

The following amounts were spent on BSE research in the financial years:

1993–94: £5,688,000

1994–95: £5,433,000

1995–96[1]: £2,447,000

1995–96[2]: £5,174,000

[1] To 31 October.
[2] Commitment.

Mink and Arctic Foxes

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provision exists at present for local authorities to protect people and domesticated animals from attacks by mink and arctic fox. [894]

Mrs. Browning: Mink and arctic foxes may be killed or taken by owners and occupiers of land if they feel that this is necessary to prevent damage, provided that the method used does not contravene current legislation, such as the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986. General advice on pest control is available from the local offices of ADAS, the Ministry's wildlife advisers.

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many mink and arctic fox are known to have escaped or been released from fur farms from 1990–91 to 1994–95. [895]

Mrs. Browning: The Ministry has received no reports of any mink or arctic foxes known to have been released or have escaped from fur farms in the period since 1990.

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he received from the Farm Animal Welfare Council on the listing of mink and arctic fox under the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976. [893]

Mrs. Browning: In 1994, the Farm Animal Welfare Council recommended that consideration be given to the inclusion of American mink, Arctic fox and racoon dog in the schedule to the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976. After consulting interested organisations my colleagues and I concluded that this, being a general approach, would not offer any welfare advantages to the species concerned. General protection for the welfare of animals farmed for their fur is already provided by the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968 and its subordinate regulations. Any more specific requirements must, in our view, be introduced on a European basis.

A copy of the letter sent to interested organisations explaining our views more fully, dated 24 August 1995, has been placed in the Library of the House.

Ostrich Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions have been made against owners of ostrich farms in the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [1015]

Mrs. Browning: The information requested is not recorded centrally.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many live ostrich chicks were imported (a) in 1994 and (b) to date. [1016]

Mrs. Browning: The only information available to the Ministry on imports from other member states is derived from the ANIMO system—which is provisional and subject to change, and relates to all ostriches—adults, chicks and hatching eggs. Information on imports from third countries is derived from quarantine reports and relates to day-old ostrich chicks.

Origin	1994	1995 to date
Other Member States	620	843
Third Countries	267	193

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many visits the State Veterinary Service has made to ostrich farms to check the condition of ostriches in the last three years. [1014]

Mrs. Browning: The information is not available for the full period requested. Since 1 April 1994, 23 welfare inspections of ostrich farms in Great Britain have been made by the State Veterinary Service.

Fish Quotas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to introduce transferable quotas for fish. [980]

Mr. Baldry: I have asked the fishing industry to let me have its ideas for alternative quota management arrangements and will consider any suggestions made that appear to be practicable and command widespread support within the industry.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the New Zealand system of fish quota allocation; and if he will make a statement. [981]

Mr. Baldry: The New Zealand system of fisheries quota management was developed to meet a very different set of circumstances from those applying within the European Union. I am nevertheless sure that the United Kingdom industry is aware of arrangements in New Zealand and other countries and will take these into account in formulating its response to my invitation for suggestions for changes in our own arrangements.

Pigs

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many piglets have been (a) tail docked and (b) tooth clipped in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [1019]

(2) what has been the change in the number of piglets which have been (a) tail docked and (b) tooth clipped since 10 August 1994. [1018]

Mrs. Browning: Figures on the number of piglets which have been tail docked and tooth clipped are not available.

The Welfare and Livestock Regulations 1994 (SI 2126) require that tail docking and tooth clipping of piglets may be carried out only when there is evidence, on the farm, that injuries to sows' teats or to other piglets have occurred or are likely to occur as a result of not carrying out these procedures. Where tooth clipping appears necessary, this must be carried out within seven days of birth.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many visits his officials have made to pig farms since 10 August 1994 to ensure compliance with paragraph 3 of part iv of schedule 3 to the Welfare of Livestock Regulations 1994. [1017]

Mrs. Browning: Since 1 July 1994, 1,204 welfare inspections of pig farms in Great Britain have been made by the State Veterinary Service.

In the course of these inspections, an assessment of compliance with all the requirements of schedule 3 to the Welfare of Livestock Regulations will be made. This will include, where appropriate, compliance with part IV of that schedule which relates specifically to piglets.

Barley

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the levels of United Kingdom intervention stocks of barley were in each month since November 1994; and what the intervention price was in each month. [159]

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is as follows:

Month	Physical stock of barley at month end '000 tonnes	Intervention price £/tonnes
December 1994	976	103.94
January 1995	820	105.08
February 1995	732	106.23 1st 107.59 17th 108.40 21st
March 1995	559	109.57 1st 109.78 6th 111.66 16th 112.83 26th
April 1995	521	114.04 1st 114.48 15th 114.93 25th
June 1995	477	108.25
July 1995	357	100.59
August 1995	260	100.59
September 1995	195	100.59
October 1995	139	100.59

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantities of barley have been supplied to Spain from United Kingdom intervention stocks during 1995; and what costs were paid to the Intervention Board for the movements. [157]

Mr. Baldry: The quantity of United Kingdom intervention barley sold during 1995 for delivery to Spain was 249,996 tonnes. The quantity delivered to Spain is subject to final confirmation by the Spanish authorities after allowing for normal handling and transport losses.

The range of successful bid prices for purchase of the barley ex-store in the UK and delivery into store in Spain was £103.01 to £106.01 per tonne.

Arable Area Payments Scheme

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average payment made under the arable area payments scheme in England in 1994. [1066]

Mr. Baldry: The average payment made in 1994 was £18,870.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many payments under the arable area payments scheme were made in England in excess of £1 million in 1994. [1065]

Mr. Baldry: For reasons of confidentiality, it is not possible to identify separately the number of payments above £1 million.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list by county the number of payments made under the arable area payments scheme in excess of £75,000 in 1994. [1067]

Mr. Baldry: For reasons of confidentiality, it is not possible to identify separately the number of payments above £75,000. However, in England a total of 2,096 claims fell into this category.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the area, the number and amount paid in each county in England under the set-aside element of the arable area payments scheme in 1994. [1062]

Mr. Baldry: Information is not available for amounts paid relating solely to the set-aside element on a county basis. However, the table gives the total area, number and amount claimed in 1994 for set-aside on land situated in each county of England. The total payment made will have been slightly lower because of reductions for various reasons.

Arable area payments scheme: set-aside element 1994

Green Minister

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were his reasons for deciding not to continue in his predecessor's role as the Green Minister within his Department. [243]

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) reports to me on all environmental matters. I have allocated the important role of Green Minister to him to ensure that the Ministry's environmental responsibilities receive the fullest possible attention and expertise.

Staffing

Mr. Byers: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many staff his Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region; what is the cost of running these regional operations; what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [268]

Mr. Boswell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) on 6 February 1995, Official Report, column 86, which provides the latest available relevant information.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

National Engineering Laboratory

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what financial arrangements have been put in place with ASL consequent upon the transfer of the National Engineering Laboratory. [2273]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Further to my reply to the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) of 31 October, Official Report, column 211, the business and staff of the National Engineering Laboratory have now transferred to Assessment Services Ltd. A payment of £1.95 million was made to ASL on completion and there will be a further adjustment as set out in my earlier answer. Overall, these terms represent better value for money for my Department than the other bids received or the sale benchmark.

Approval to this new service will be sought in a winter supplementary estimate for the Department of Trade and Industry's programmes and administration vote—class IV, vote 1. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of £1.95 million has been met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

EU Consumers Council

Dr. Spink: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Consumers Council held on 9 November. [2231]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I represented the United Kingdom at the Council. Political agreement was reached on a compromise text on the comparative advertising directive. The text fully meets United Kingdom objectives and concerns.

There was an orientation debate on the Commission's proposals for a new directive on unit-pricing—the requirement for retailers to indicate the price per unit of measurement. While welcoming the general thrust of the proposal as providing the consumer with an accurate and easily understood price comparison mechanism, I strongly argued that national Governments should be given discretionary power to exempt small shops from unit pricing, gaining support from a number of other member states. On grounds of subsidiarity, there was general support for allowing member states to determine on a national basis whether to exempt specific products from unit pricing; and the unit of measurement by which individual products should be unit priced.

The Council passed a resolution welcoming the Commission's report on the operation of the consumer credit directive and inviting the commission to undertake further study before proposing any further initiatives in this area. It was also agreed that the Commission should undertake studies in co-operation with member states on consumer education and information and on miracle products.

The Commission presented its paper on priorities for consumer policy 1996 to 1998, concentrating on financial services, public utilities, measures to enable the consumer to benefit from the information society, measures to improve consumer confidence in foodstuffs and to encourage sustainable consumption. These proposals will be subject to further consideration.

Mr. Barnes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Consumers Council held on 19 November listing all votes, and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without discussion. [438]

Mr. Evans [holding answer 20 November 1995]: My answer today to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) covered the discussion points at the EU Consumers Council held on 9 November.

The following decisions were adopted without discussion.

Invocation of the urgency procedure for consultation of the European Parliament on a Council decision on the fourth medium-term Community action programme on equal opportunities for men and women; procedure for consultation with the European Parliament delaying the review of tasks by two years until the end of 1997, on developing the European Environment Agency's communication network and on participation of central and eastern European countries in agency's work programme; the recommendation for a Council decision on the participation of the EC in the negotiations on the amendments and adaptations of the Vienna convention and the associated protocol—Montreal protocol—on substances that deplete the ozone layer; and confirmation of replacement of various—non-British—members of the Committee of the Regions.

All these decisions were reached by unanimity.

Manufacturing Industry (Energy Use)

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the gross domestic product energy ratio for industry for each of the last 10 years. [1449]

Mr. Page: Figures for energy use, output and the energy ratio for the manufacturing industry are as follows:

Indices (1990=100)

	Output of the manufacturing industry (at constant factor cost)[1]	Energy use by the manufacturing industry[2]	Energy ratio (energy use per unit of output)
1985	84.5	110.5	130.8
1986	85.6	108.4	126.7
1987	89.6	106.3	118.6

Electricity Supplies

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the extent to which electricity suppliers are fulfilling their obligations to maintain the service lead of wiring and equipment in the customer's premises up to the meter; and if he will make a statement. [1448]

Mr. Page: The statutory obligations on public electricity suppliers to maintain their service equipment in consumers' premises are set out in the Electricity Supply Regulations 1988, as amended.

These regulations are administered and enforced by the engineering inspectorate in the Department of Trade and Industry. The inspectorate monitors all incidents and accidents which must be reported to the Secretary of State under regulation 34 of these regulations.

The inspectorate carries out inspections of suppliers' woks including those located on consumer's premises under section 30(2) of the Electricity Act 1989 and regulation 33 of the regulations.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility, in each year since 1990. [1451]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The total energy consumption and consumption per square metre, as measured by the Government's published energy targets, of buildings for which DTI is responsible in each year since 1990, are as follows:

			Reduction from base year
Year	Total Consumption	£/m² Measure	Total (Percentage)	£/m² (Percentage)
1990–91	209,559,185 KWh	16.32	—	—

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many matters have been referred by him to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in each of the last 16 years. [1512]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The number of references by category as at 21 November 1995 is as follows:

	Mergers[1]/Monopoly sections 78 and 79		References under section

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions in each of the last 16 years the Office of Fair Trading advised reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; on how many occasions that advice was followed; and if he will list those occasions when that advice was not followed. [1513]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Under the Fair Trading Act 1973, the Director General of Fair Trading advises my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade whether to refer qualifying mergers to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The number of mergers on which the DGFT advised reference is as follows:

1979: 5
1980: 5
1981: 8
1982: 8
1983: 9
1984: 5
1985: 6
1986: 15
1987: 6
1988: 10
1989: 15
1990: 23
1991: 8
1992: 11
1993: 5
1994: 7
1995: 9 (so far)

The DGFT's advice to refer was followed in all cases except those detailed:

1979

Thorn/EMI

Calor Gas Ltd/certain assets of South Western Gas Board (Glogas)

1983

Blue Circle/assets of Bristol Channel (Aberthaw)

Dalgety/certain assets of Rank Hovis McDougall

1984

Nestle/Carnation

1986

Cannon/Screen Entertainment

Owens Corning Fibreglass/certain assets of Pilkington

1991

BPB Industries/certain assets of Poliet Group

1993

GEC/Infra-Red business of Phillips

Airtours/Owners Abroad

1995

Hasbro/Waddington Games

North West Water/NORWEB

Also earlier this year, the DGFT recommended that the Scottish and Newcastle/Courage merger should be referred to the MMC. I asked the DGFT to explore possible enforceable undertakings as an alternative to reference. The DGFT subsequently advised that undertakings should be accepted in lieu or reference; I agreed.

In addition, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade referred one case each in 1982, and 1983, and four cases in 1990, against the advice of the DGFT not to refer.

Realising Our Potential Awards

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many applications for ROPA were received by the (a) Medical Research Council, (b) Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council, (c) Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council, (d) Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council and (e) Economic and Social Research Council; how many were turned down in each case because of ineligibility; and how many were rejected. [20]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The following tables show the number of ROPAs received; the number awarded; the number turned down because of ineligibility; and the number rejected for each of he research councils.

British Aerospace Royal Ordnance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much the Export Credit Guarantees Department has provided to British Aerospace Royal Ordnance since its privatisation. [994]

Mr. Nelson: On grounds of commercial confidentiality, ECGD does not publicise details of individual firms' business without their prior approval.

Arms Sales (Nigeria)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much the Export Credit Guarantees Department has provided for arms sales to Nigeria in the last five years. [995]

Mr. Nelson: The ECGD has provided no guarantees for arms sales to Nigeria during this period.

Working Hours

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of the relative number of hours worked by employees in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU countries. [1006]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The latest available figures are for 1993. The average usual hours worked a week by employees in the United Kingdom was 37.2, compared to an average of 37.1 for all the states that were members of the European Union at that time.

Environmental Technology Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to support the growth of the environmental technology industry. [1161]

Mr. Page: The Department of Trade and Industry will continue to work with the environmental industry, including technology suppliers, to improve its competitiveness in world markets. In particular, the joint environmental markets unit, established by the DTI and the Department of the Environment, is supporting the industry's efforts to exploit the substantial market opportunities which are being generated by rising environmental standards at home and overseas. It is assisting the industry to identify these opportunities and to raise its profile overseas. The unit is promoting collaboration between the various organisations representing the industry to achieve the co-ordinated response to environmental problems which world markets now demand; and it will work with the industry through the technology foresight process to address technological challenges for the future.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of United Kingdom exports were generated by the environmental technology industry in each year since 1992–93. [1162]

Mr. Ian Taylor: There is no standard definition of "the environmental technology industry". United Kingdom exports of pollution control and monitoring equipment generated 0.4 per cent. of total exports in 1992, and 0.5 per cent. in 1993 and 1994.

Using a definition of the environmental products industries as producing "a product which enhances or prevents the deterioration of the external environment", it is estimated that exports of all environmental products made up 0.8 per cent. of total UK exports in 1992. Estimates have not been made for later years.

Deregulation

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the deregulation measures agreed by his Department during the current year. [286]

Mr. Lang: Deregulation encompasses a wide range of activities to minimise burdens on business, including not only amendment and repeal of burdensome regulation but also scrutinising new regulations and encouraging business-friendly enforcement practices. Significant measures agreed by my Department this year can be found in "Deregulation: the Way Forward", presented by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, 22 May 1995, and the Government response to the first annual report of the deregulation task force, September 1995. Both publications are available in the Library of the House.

Defence Export Licences

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what applications for export licences to countries in the middle east for defence equipment have (a) been granted, (b) received and (c) discussed over the past year; and if he will make a statement. [627]

Mr. Nelson: Earlier this year, there were placed in the Library of the House detailed statistical analyses of export licences which were granted for military, paramilitary and security equipment in the calendar years 1993 and 1994. These analyses included all countries of destination for which these licences were issued, including middle east countries. Early in 1996, I intend to place in the Library of the House a similar analysis for the calender year 1995. I shall write to the hon. Member when this is done.

As regards "applications received", this total is the sum of those which are granted and which are refused—other than those which lapse during their processing at the instigation of the applicant. Details of licences which were refused in 1993 and in 1994 were included in the Export Control Organisation's annual reports for those two years and copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House. As part of the task of statistical analysis for the year 1995, to which I have referred, I intend to include in the statistical report details of licences which were refused.

I am not clear as to what further information the hon. Member is seeking when he asks which applications have been "discussed".

All military, security and paramilitary goods and arms, ammunition and related material are controlled under the UK's export control legislation and cannot be exported without a licence from the Department of Trade and Industry. The Government observe strict responsibility over arms exports, primarily by means of considering applications for export licences against strict established criteria. These criteria include those which have been agreed with our European Union partners and in other international forums. We consider very carefully the political and military implications of allowing individual arms consignments to go overseas. We pay particular attention to proposed exports of military goods to countries with poor human rights records, where such goods might be used for internal repression, and to countries or regions where the export of arms might contribute to destabilisation of the area.

The UK also observes arms embargoes imposed by the United Nations and the European Union on a number of countries. Individual decisions as to whether specific equipment should be exported to specific markets are therefore taken in the light of these internationally agreed commitments.

Inward Investment

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the value, at current prices, of inward investment to the United Kingdom during the last five years. [1398]

Mr. Eggar: Information on the topics is regularly published in "United Kingdom Balance of Payments—The Pink Book" and "First Release—Balance of Payments", both produced by the Central Statistical Office, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Consultancy Brokerage Service

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what alternative uses have been found for the £1.37 million of the expenditure on the Consultancy Brokerage Service referred to in his answer of 23 October 1995, Official Report, column 420, which was spent on information technology hardware. [1125]

Mr. Lang: A number of the items have been redeployed within my Department, thus avoiding the need to purchase such equipment for the projects being set up in those areas. This redeployed equipment has a current book value—that is, cost minus 30 per cent depreciation per year—of £120,316. A small amount of hardware has been sold to the external contractors who were to have delivered the Consultancy Brokerage Service for an aggregate of £43,986. The remainder will now be offered for sale to other Government Departments, which is the normal procedure in the case of disposal of Government assets. Any items not utilised across the government estate will be offered for sale at auction, in line with Government accounting procedures.

On further checking, I would now like to make it clear that the previous answer to which the hon Member refers—23 October 1995, Official Report, column 420—was incorrect. The sum of £1.37 million was the total amount spent on information technology development, of which £395,376 was spent on equipment.

Skills Challenge

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the firms which were awarded the small firms training challenge; and how much they were awarded. [944]

Mr. Page: The panel has selected 14 innovative projects, featuring almost 180 small firms, as award winners of the first stage of bids for the skills challenge, jointly funded by DTI and DFEE. The partnerships are as follows:

3D Design—Marine Technology. Sponsored by Tyneside TEC

Press and Mould Toolmaking. Sponsored by Lancashire Area West TEC (LAWTEC)

"Office Team". Sponsored by Coventry and Warwickshire TEC

"Makeover". 10 Ethnic Minority and Indigenous Independent Retailers. Sponsored by Hertfordshire TEC

Lincolnshire Trainers' Network. Sponsored by Lincolnshire TEC

"Micro-Business". Sponsored by London East TEC

Clothing Companies. Sponsored by North London TEC

Southampton Area Co-operative Development Agency (SACDA). Sponsored by Hampshire TEC

"Forging Ahead". Sponsored by Milton Keynes and North Bucks Chamber of Commerce Training and Enterprise.

"Schematic". Sponsored by Devon and Cornwall TEC

Four sector bids have also received awards. These are:

Engineering Training Authority (ENTRA) (Supplier Chain Performance)

The Confederation of British Wool Textiles

The Academy of Food and Wine

Seafish Training

Projects will receive an average award of around £50,000. Contracts are currently being negotiated with the winning partnerships.

Taxation (Self-assessment)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions his Department has had with the Inland Revenue regarding the possibility of issuing computer software to aid self-assessment of tax liabilities. [946]

Mr. Page: The Inland Revenue plans to issue computer software to help those who have to prepare and submit a self-assessment tax return. There are two initiatives:

(1) to provide tax software suppliers with the communications products required to enable agents to transmit returns electronically to the Inland Revenue, thus reducing costs and providing prompt, accurate processing of the return; and

(2) to issue, on request, to those taxpayers who have a computer, a floppy disc which will help them prepare and print their return.

The Inland Revenue has consulted widely in preparing these proposals. It has held discussions with the Department of Trade and Industry.

Business Links

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish the fee rates for advice given by each business link in the last year. [947]

Mr. Page: As private sector organisations, business links are responsible for determining their own pricing structures for advice and information in response to local customer needs and economic conditions. Fee rates charged by individual business links are not collated centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Small Firms (British Standard)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans his Department has for a British standard for small firms. [949]

Mr. Page: This Department has no plans to introduce a British standard specific to small firms.

Telephone Services, Dover

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy that compensation will be payable to telephone users in respect of delays in the provision of competitive telephony services in the Dover and Deal area as a result of delays in starting and completing work on the Dover and Deal area franchise for cable television. [588]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Telecommunications Act licence for the Dover cable TV franchise does not provide for financial penalties to be levied for any failure to meet build obligations.

ISDN Services

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what assessment he has made of the impact of the current pricing policy for ISDN lines in the United Kingdom on the development of the information super-highways; [594]

(2) if he will discuss with the Director General Telecommunications the current price levels of ISDN lines and the impact that such price levels are having on the development of the information super-highways. [589]

(3) if he will examine the current prices for ISDN lines in the United Kingdom and in other countries; and what assessment he has made of the impact current price levels are having on the United Kingdom's international competitive position. [590]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The pricing of ISDN services and the extent to which they are available are matters for the commercial judgment of service providers. However, both my Department and the Office of Telecommunications are aware of some concerns about the level of relative prices of ISDN services in the UK compared to other countries. In some countries which have cheaper prices than the UK, the markets are not liberalised, so it is impossible to assess whether the prices charged reflect the true cost of providing the service. However, Oftel is considering the inclusion of ISDN services in BT's price cap when it is next reviewed.

The introduction of effective niche competition will also bring prices down. The Government's policy of licensing alternative infrastructure such as radio fixed access systems should contribute to this. Operating at 10 GHz, these systems could provide an alternative ISDN service to that offered by BT and some cable providers.

The provision of telecoms products and services makes a large direct contribution to national competitiveness. Liberalisation has also brought reductions in overall charges and the rapid development of advanced services and facilities, including ISDN, which boost competitiveness across all sectors.

Use of the information super-highway is increasing rapidly, with the commercial sector making the largest contribution to that rate of growth. ISDN capacity at 64,000 bit is an important technology for the development of the information society, but is only one of the technological developments whose availability has encouraged greater exploitation of the Internet.

Cable Television, Dover

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the progress of the cable television franchiser in the Dover-Deal area; and to what extent the progress to date meets the requirements of the franchise. [591]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Responsibility for monitoring and enforcing compliance with the build obligations contained in Bell Cablemedia's Telecommunications Act licence for its Dover franchise is a matter for the Director General of Telecommunications. I have therefore asked the director general to write to the hon. Member with details of progress made to date.

Nuclear Energy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the implications for British Nuclear import and export policy of the extension of the US-Euratom co-operation agreement on the peaceful uses of nuclear energy, signed by the Commission in November, and if he will place in the Library a copy of the text of the extended co-operation agreement. [1576]

Mr. Eggar: The US-Euratom agreement for peaceful nuclear co-operation is intended to provide a secure basis for co-operation and trade between the nuclear industries of the two parties as well as a number of third countries, and provides a framework for this trade to expand in the future. The agreement will now go to the US Congress for its approval.

Copies of the text of the agreement signed on 7 November will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses shortly when these become available from Brussels.

PRIME MINISTER

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what response Her Majesty's Government have sent to the Libyan request that a trial takes place in The Hague under a Scottish judge, under Scottish rules of evidence, of the two Libyans accused of the bombing of Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie. [1632]

The Prime Minister: The Government of Libya have made no direct representation to us, but our position remains that there is no acceptable alternative to the trial taking place in Scotland or the United States.

Libya

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will discuss with the UN Security Council the ending of UN sanctions over Libya. [359]

The Prime Minister: The United Nations sanctions committee on Libya is today holding its 11th review of sanctions.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Prime Minister (1) how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentage of invoices paid late; [964]

(2) what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [924]

The Prime Minister: For this purpose, my Department is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the replies given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility, in each year since 1990. [1452]

The Prime Minister: For this purpose, my office forms part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Training)

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers, and from which countries, have received training by police authorities in this country in the last five years. [225]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 21 November 1995]: Information is available only for the period since January 1991. Central records show that 157 training visits to police forces have taken place since then involving officers from the countries listed. The number of officers involved is not recorded.

Homosexuals (Violence)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what studies are currently being carried out by his Department on the subject of violence against homosexuals. [604]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 20 November 1995]: None.

Invoices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late. [959]

Mr. Howard: My Department publicises information about its payment practices in its annual report, including a commitment to the Confederation of British Industry prompt payment code. Statistics on prompt payment are currently publicised only as a percentage of invoices paid.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days in each of the last five years. [1115]

Mr. Howard: Information about the total value of invoices not paid within 30 days in each of the last five years is not available except at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoice.

Mr. Howard: An analysis of invoices paid in October 1995 shows that on average they were paid within 24 days of receipt of a valid invoice.

Correspondence

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will be in a position to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Oldham, West of 27 October following up the meeting with the former Under-Secretary on 22 August concerning the case of Atia Idrees, J242872. [469]

Mr. Kirkhope: Inquiries into Miss Idrees's case are continuing. I will write to the hon. Member shortly detailing the current situation.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will be in a position to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Oldham, West of 1 September, concerning Mr. Inayat Khan, K455873/2 (S), PO 01496/95. [468]

Mr. Kirkhope: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

Manslaughter Convictions (Children)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people sentenced under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 during the years of 1974 to 1993 were convicted of manslaughter; and, of those convicted of manslaughter, how many were sentenced to detention for life. [630]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested for the years 1979 to 1994 is given in the table. Information for earlier years is not available centrally.

[1] Section 2, Homicide Act 1957.

[2] Comparison with prison receptions suggests that there may have been under recording in 1989 and 1990, although this is less likely in 1990.

[3] Under the Criminal Justice Act 1991, the arrangements for imposing longer sentences also applied to 17 year olds from 1 October 1992.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many tariffs of those convicted of manslaughter under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 during the years 1974 to 1993 and sentenced to detention for life were (a) under five years, (b) six to nine years, (c) 10 to 14 years and (d) 15 to 20 years. [632]

Miss Widdecombe: There have been 16 prisoners in Prison Service custody convicted between 1974 and 1993 of manslaughter under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

The information about their tariffs is as follows:

(a) under 5 years: 2[1]

(b) 6 to 9 years: 9

(c) 10 to 14 years: 5

(d) 15 to 20 years: 0

[1]Includes one tariff of 5 years.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young offenders sentenced under section 53(2) of the Children and young Persons Act 1933 from 1974 to 1993 commenced their sentences within local authority secure accommodation; and at what age they were subsequently transferred to prison department custody. [633]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about young offenders sentenced under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

Records are not available before 1983. The figures since 1983 are set out in the attached table. Records are not kept on the age at which young offenders transfer to custody.

Year	A	B	C (Percentage)
1983	53	13	24.5
1984	52	16	30.8
1985	44	13	29.5
1986	57	9	15.8
1987	56	14	25.0
1988	61	11	18.0
1989	60	11	18.3
1990	71	13	18.3
1991	57	11	19.3
1992	80	11	13.8
1993	116	18	15.5

Notes:

A=Number of section 53(2)s who commenced their sentences in local authority secure accommodation.

B=Number of section 53(2)s who transferred from local authority secure accommodation to Young Offender Institutions.

C=Percentage of the total section 53(2) who transferred.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many and what percentage of the employees of the Commission for Racial Equality are from (a) white European, (b) Asian, (c) black and (d) other ethnic minorities. [114]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 30 June 1995, the breakdown of employees at the Commission for Racial Equality by racial groups was as follows:

	Number	Per cent.
White European	62	29
Asian	36	17
Black	97	46
Other ethnic minorities	17	8
	212	100

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Commission for Racial Equality's 1994 restructuring programme, and indicate in particular both the total number of jobs which were shed as a result of that programme and the numbers of (a) white European and (b) ethnic minority redundancies associated with that total. [116]

Mr. Kirkhope: We welcome action by the Commission for Racial Equality to restructure its organisation to provide greater efficiency. No jobs were lost as a result of this exercise.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (a) his policy and (b) that of the Commission for Racial Equality in respect of the shortlisting and appointment of disproportionately few member of ethnic minorities; and if he will make a statement. [118]

Mr. Kirkhope: Appointments should be on merit and on the ability of the individual to meet the criteria for the post concerned. The Commission for Racial Equality's equal opportunities policy aims to ensure that no job applicant or employee receive less favourable treatment than another on the grounds of race, colour, nationality, ethnic or national origins, or religious beliefs.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members currently serve upon the Commission for Racial Equality; and how many of those are of white European background. [115]

Mr. Kirkhope: There are currently 12 commissioners on the Commission for Racial Equality. Two are of white European background.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he intends to take to ensure that the ethnic representation among members and employees of the Commission for Racial Equality in future reflects that of society as a whole. [117]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Commission for Racial Equality operates an equal opportunities policy. I support this. It advertises vacancies in the mainstream press, and some of the ethnic minority press in order to ensure that all sections of the community are aware of job opportunities with the commission. Appointments should always be made on merit.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to prosecute the Commission for Racial Equality for discriminatory employment practices; and if he will make it his policy to bring forward legislation to abolish that Commission. [119]

Mr. Kirkhope: We have no plans to do either.

Immigration Officers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the total remuneration to immigration officers was based on performance-related pay, for the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [629]

Mr. Kirkhope: Immigration Service grades are currently covered by the national civil service pay settlements and information is not readily available in the form requested.

Exclusion Orders

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many exclusion orders have been (a) imposed, (b) revoked, (c) reimposed at the expiry of a previous order and (d) allowed to lapse by him in the last 12 months. [1223]

Mr. Howard: Figures for the number of exclusion orders imposed, revoked, renewed and allowed to lapse over the last year are shown in the below table.

Number of exclusion orders in force, renewed, revoked, or allowed to lapse: November 1994-November 1995

Newly-made orders	Orders revoked	Orders renewed	Orders allowed to lapse
0	20	4	6

Car Crime

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to collect information on the make and year of manufacture of vehicles affected by theft; and what assessment he has made of the usefulness of such information in tackling car crime. [1197]

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office does not routinely collect information about the make and year of manufacture of stolen vehicles. In 1991, however, information relating to the previous calendar year was used to compile the car theft index which revealed conclusively that certain makes and models of car were more at risk of theft than others. The recently published study by the police research group into the theft of heavy goods vehicles includes information about vehicles stolen during 1994 broken down by make, year of registration and body type, and by location and time at which theft occurred. The findings of the study are being used to encourage vehicle and security device manufacturers and heavy goods vehicles owners and drivers to take specific action to help reduce theft levels.

As the result of an agreement signed earlier this year between the Home Office and the CCN Group Ltd., the National Criminal Intelligence Service is receiving comprehensive data on all stolen vehicles from CCN and using this information, which can be broken down into various categories, in its work against organised crime. We are currently considering what other uses can be made of these data in combating vehicle crime in general.

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the number of reported burglaries from motor vehicles in the area covering Dudley, West in each year since 1979 and the percentage difference in the number of those reported burglaries between 1979 and the latest year for which figures are available; [586]

(2) what was the number of reported thefts from motor vehicles in the area covering Dudley, West in each year since 1979 and the percentage difference in the number of those reported thefts between 1979 and the latest year for which figures are available; [584]

(3) what was the total number of reported crimes in the area covering Dudley, West in each year since 1979 and the percentage difference in the number of those reported crimes between 1979 and the latest year for which figures are available. [587]

(4) what was the number of reported thefts of motor vehicles in the area covering Dudley, West in each year since 1979 and the percentage difference in the number of those reported thefts between 1979 and the latest year for which figures are available. [585]

Mr. Maclean: The information is not collected centrally.

Eaton Leonard Green

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment he has made of the adequacy of compliance with the present Home Office guidelines in relation to police informants; [597]

(2) when he was informed of the entry into the United Kingdom of Eaton Leonard Green; [1048]

(3) what action he proposes to take against Scotland Yard staff in respect of the Eaton Leonard Green case; [1044]

(4) if he will list (a) the charges brought against Eaton Leonard Green and (b) the charges for which he was prosecuted; and what role his Department played in determining which charges should proceed to prosecution; [1050]

(5) which senior officer or officers had responsibility for the close supervision of Eaton Leonard Green in accordance with Home Office guidelines; [1042]

(6) what factors underlay the admission of Eaton Leonard Green into the United Kingdom on 12 February 1991; [1049]

(7) when he received the first and second internal inquiries carried out by Scotland Yard into the Eaton Green case. [1043]

Mr. Maclean: The use of informants is an operational matter for the police. It is for each chief constable to ensure that there are proper procedures for handling informants in his force. It is also for each chief constable to take whatever action he considers appropriate if he believes one of his officers has acted improperly in handling an informant.

Eaton Green was admitted to the United Kingdom on 13 February 1991. The immigration officer who dealt with him was satisfied that he was coming to this country as a visitor and give him leave to enter for six months. Ministers were not aware of police interest in him or of his role as a police informant until after his conviction was reported in the press.

Eaton Green was charged by Nottinghamshire constabulary of:

(i) conspiracy to commit grievous bodily harm, contrary to section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977;

(ii) conspiracy to rob, contrary to section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977;

(iii) possession of a firearm whilst committing an indictable offence—viz; robbery, contrary to section 18(1) of the Firearms Act 1968;

(iv) possession of a firearm with intent to endanger life, contrary to section 16 of the Firearms Act 1968.

Count (i) was varied on the indictment to;

(v) conspiracy to cause actual bodily harm, contrary to section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977.

Green was acquitted of charge (v) by direction of the judge. He pleaded guilty to charges (ii) and (iv) and also pleaded guilty to causing grievous bodily harm, contrary to section 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861. The prosecution did not proceed with the other charges, given his guilty plea.

The Home Office played no part in determining what charges should be brought against Mr. Green or what charges proceeded to prosecution.

A former detective chief inspector at Brixton police station was the senior officer responsible for controlling Eaton Green as a police informant.

The two initial inquiries in relation to this case were internal to the Metropolitan police. The report of a third inquiry is being prepared, a copy of which will be sent to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are currently seeking asylum from an address in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) Northern Ireland and (d) by region, within England. [564]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on the places or residence of people currently seeking asylum is not held centrally.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the average time currently taken to resolve fully an asylum application, including determination of any appeal to the Immigration Appellate Authority; [562]

(2) what is the average time taken by his Department's asylum division to process and despatch to the Immigration Appellate Authority an appeal against a refusal of admission; and what is the average number of working days between the date of the appeal being despatched to the IAA by his Department and the date of its determination; [560]

(3) what is the average time currently taken by his Department to reach an initial decision on (a) asylum applications submitted prior to implementation of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993, (b) asylum applications submitted since the implementation of the Act and (c) all asylum applications. [561]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on the times taken at the various stages of the asylum process are given in the table.

Average times involved in deciding applications for asylum April–September 1995

	Months
Time taken for an initial decision to be made (Pre-Act applications)	34.1
Time taken for an initial decision to be made (Post-Act applications)	8.7
Time taken by the Home Office to process an appeal	4.1
Time taken by the IAA to determine an appeal	5.6

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applications are currently awaiting an initial decision by the Home Office asylum division; how many appeals against a refusal of asylum are currently being processed by the Home Office; and how many appeals against a refusal of asylum, having been processed by the Home Office and despatched to the Immigration Appellate Authority, are awaiting determination by the IAA. [558]

Mr. Kirkhope: As at 30 September 1995, 64,415 asylum applications were awaiting initial decisions by the Home Office, 2,705 appeals were being processed by the Home Office from people seeking asylum and 8,925 such appeals were awaiting hearings by the Immigration Appellate Authority.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to implement paragraphs 17, 22 and 31 of the resolution on minimum guarantees for asylum procedures, signed at the European Union Justice and Home Affairs Council at Luxembourg on 20 and 21 June. [556]

Mr. Kirkhope: Asylum procedures in the United Kingdom are consistent with those paragraphs and this will remain the case after implementation of the asylum proposals announced by my right hon. and learned Friend on 20 November.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the European countries which operate accelerated asylum procedures which derogate from the general principle that an individual appealing against a refusal of asylum may remain in the country until such time as the appeal is determined. [551]

Mr. Kirkhope: Comprehensive information is not available but our understanding is that France, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden and Switzerland are all countries where, depending on the circumstances, appeals against removal on safe third country grounds may have no automatic suspensive effect; and that Denmark, Finland, Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland operate procedures based on identification of countries of origin in which there is considered to be no serious risk of persecution.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date a copy of the resolution on minimum guarantees for asylum procedures, signed at the Justice and Home Affairs Council in June 1995, was placed in the Library. [555]

Miss Widdecombe: A copy is being placed in the Library.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to implement paragraphs 8 and 12 of the resolution on manifestly unfounded applications for asylum and the conclusions on countries in which there is generally no serious risk of persecution, signed at the Justice and Home Affairs Council in London on 30 November and 1 December 1992. [557]

Mr. Kirkhope: Asylum procedures in the United Kingdom are consistent with these paragraphs and this will remain the case after the implementation of the asylum proposals announced by my right hon. and learned Friend on 20 November.

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance his Department gives to failed asylum applicants from Sri Lanka before their return there; what steps are taken to ensure that such applicants are returned to safe areas of Sri Lanka; and which areas of Sri Lanka are considered to be safe for such a purpose. [14]

Mr. Kirkhope: No specific guidance is given to unsuccessful asylum seekers from Sri Lanka before their return there. It is considered safe to return Sri Lankan nationals who have no claim to remain here to Colombo and the south of the country.

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each year since 1990, the number of applicants who have been refused asylum in the UK and have subsequently suffered (a) persecution, (b) imprisonment and (c) the death penalty in the country to which they have been returned. [148]

Mr. Kirkhope: We have no means of monitoring what happens to people who have been returned to their country of origin. However, no person who has demonstrated that he or she has a well-founded fear of persecution in a particular country for one of the reasons set out in the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees would be returned to that country.

Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum were (a) granted and (b) refused from applicants in (i) India, (ii) Pakistan and (iii) Nigeria in (1) 1993 and (2) 1994. [1094]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on decisions relating to asylum applications from nationals of India, Pakistan and Nigeria is published in tables 3.1 and 3.3 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15–95. A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

European Treaties

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates the EU treaties on simplified extradition procedures, Europol, the customs information system and protection of the communities' financial interests were (a) agreed in principle, (b) signed, (c) ratified and (d) came into force; and on what dates copies of the agreed texts were made available to the House. [909]

Miss Widdecombe: The convention on simplified extradition procedures was agreed and signed by Ministers at the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 10 March. The conventions on Europol, the customs information system and protection of the communities' financial interests were agreed by Heads of Government at the Cannes European Council on 26 and 27 June and signed by European Union ambassadors on 26 July. The United Kingdom Government have yet to ratify any of the conventions. In each case, they will enter into force three months after the last member state to ratify a particular instrument has notified the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Union that the necessary domestic procedures have been completed.

In accordance with the arrangements for scrutiny of work under title VI of the treaty on European Union, the Government submitted draft texts of these conventions for examination by the Home Affairs Committee and the Select Committee on European Legislation. A copy of the extradition convention was sent to the Library on 30 March. I regret that texts of the other conventions were not deposited in the Library at the time of their signature, but this has now been done.

Doncaster Prison

Mr. Goerge Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the incident on 20 September which led to the temporary closure of Doncaster prison and the searching of all prisoners. [390]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A.J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the incident on 20 September which led to the temporary closure of Doncaster prison and the searching of all prisoners.

Information was received from an external source of a possible escape attempt from the prison and that weapons might be used. A full close down search took place on 20 September with the additional support of the South Yorkshire police.

No escape equipment nor any weapons were discovered as a result of the search.

Chimpanzees

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the most recent date when chimpanzees were used in a UK facility designated under the Animals Scientific Procedures Act 1986; [144]

(2) what plans he has to ban the use of chimpanzees in research and testing in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [143]

Mr. Kirkhope: None have been used under the Act in any designated establishment.

We have no plans to ban the use of chimpanzees in research and testing in the United Kingdom. Any application to use chimpanzees in a procedure requiring to be licensed under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 would be considered in accordance with the requirements of section 5 of the Act, and also referred to the Animal Procedures Committee for advice. Exceptional and specific justification would have to be established to show why chimpanzees, rather than any other protected species, were required.

Police (Self-defence and Restraint)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make available in the Library (a) the guidance on self-defence and restraint of the Association of Chief Police Officers and (b) the evidence of the Police Complaints Authority on the effect of neck holds and certain arm locks; and if he will make a statement. [153]

Mr. Maclean: No. The Association of Chief Police Officers guidance on self-defence and restraint, which is currently under review, deals with operational matters which could be of assistance to criminals and is not intended for publication outside the police service. Any evidence on neck holds and arm locks available to the Police Complaints Authority is a matter for the authority itself.

Parole Delays

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are undergoing parole delays; how long, on average, these delays take; what is the percentage of accepted parole applications; and what is the cost per week per inmate undergoing parole delays. [39]

Miss Widdecombe: For the period August to October 1995, some 800 prisoners were notified of parole decisions after their parole eligibility date or its anniversary. The average delay was just over seven weeks, 46 per cent. of all applications for parole were accepted.

The cost of keeping an inmate in prison varies between establishments. The average cost per inmate per week in category C accommodation is currently about £378.

Internet

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been in the last year for offences related to the dissemination of illegal material via the Internet. [174]

Mr. Maclean: Court proceedings data held centrally by my Department does not identify this type of offence.

Prison Officers (Drug Offences)

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers have been given custodial sentences for drugs offences in each year since 1990, broken down by type of offence. [134]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking how many prison officers have been given custodial sentences for drugs offences in each year since 1990, broken down by type of offence.

The Prison Service has no record of any prison officer receiving a custodial sentence for drugs offences in any of the years in question.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the level of staffing in CID offices and other police units involved in extensive detective work; and if he will make a statement. [150]

Mr. Maclean: It is for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to deploy his resources as he sees fit.

Elections

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ballot papers were rejected for want of an official mark in the 1992 general election. [907]

Mr. Kirkhope: Some 2,593 ballot papers were rejected for want of an official mark in the 1992 general election. Statistics concerning the outcome of the 1992 general election, including information on the number of ballot papers rejected on these grounds, are published in the HMSO booklet "Election Expenses".

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many election petitions have been applied for in respect of local government, parliamentary and Euro-elections since 1970. [911]

Mr. Kirkhope: The number of election petitions applied for in respect of local government and parliamentary elections since 1970 is 80 and six, respectively; the comparable figure for European parliamentary elections since 1979 when those elections first took place is three.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he took in response to the recommendation of the Home Affairs Committee in the 1982–83 Session that the requirement to stamp the ballot paper with an official mark be ended; and if he will make a statement. [906]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Government considered carefully the recommendation by the Home Affairs Select Committee but decided that the official mark should be retained. The Government concluded that the official mark provided a continuing safeguard against the introduction into the ballot of counterfeit or illegally acquired ballot papers. The Government's full response to the recommendations is available in "The Government Reply to the First Report from the Home Affairs Committee Session 1982–83 HC32–1".

Immigration Rules

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is informed of all decisions of the immigration authorities to allow entry to the United Kingdom outside the normal immigration rules. [1045]

Mr. Kirkhope: It would not be practical for my right hon. and learned Friend to be informed personally of every occasion on which discretion is exercised on his behalf outside the immigration rules.

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances (a) police and (b) immigration officials have the right to instruct immigration officials to allow someone permanent leave to remain in the United Kingdom when that person has no legal right to do so. [1045]

Mr. Kirkhope: Leave to remain is granted under the immigration rules on my right hon. and learned Friend's behalf. The police have no locus in the matter. Discretion to grant indefinite leave to remain outside the rules is exercised sparingly, in accordance with instructions or in exceptional compassionate circumstances.

Premier Prison Services Ltd.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what special qualifications are required of Premier Prison Services Ltd. staff to deal with immigration detainees; what is the ratio of staff to detainees; and if he will make a statement. [402]

Mr. Kirkhope: Premier Prison Services Ltd. is not responsible for the management of any immigration detention centre. However, people detained under immigration powers may be detained in Doncaster prison, which is managed by the company. Requirements as to the company's performance and staffing are set down in a management contract awarded by the Prison Service.

Police (Patrol Duties)

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of police strength is out on patrol duties between (a) midnight and 6am, (b) 6am and 12 noon, (c) 12 noon and 6pm and (d) 6pm and midnight. [145]

Mr. Maclean: This information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Tobacco Project Licences

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the purposes for which project licences have been approved by the Animal Procedures Committee in relation to tobacco in the last five years. [335]

Mr. Kirkhope: The following project licences have been granted:

1991: none

1992: (i) the development of in vitro methods to monitor the genetic damage caused in humans by environmental pollutants; and (ii) the use of tobacco smoke as one experimental tool to study lung disease.

1993: none.

1994: none.

1995:

(i) the evaluation of the role of bacterial toxins in sudden infant death syndrome; and

(ii) the investigation of the role of bacterial toxins in periodontal disease.

It is the practice of the Animal Procedures Committee to set out in its annual reports details of all such applications considered.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the inter-departmental group on domestic violence last met; and what policy decisions arose. [333]

Mr. Maclean: For the policy issues considered at the last meeting of the ministerial group on domestic violence, held on 17 May 1994, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question on 17 January, columns 380-81. A date for the next meeting of the ministerial group has not yet been fixed, but it is likely to meet early in the new year.

The official inter-departmental group on domestic violence met on Wednesday 15 November 1995. The group reviewed the Government-funded domestic violence public awareness campaign and the recent publication of an inter-agency circular designed to promote a more co-ordinated response to domestic violence by local agencies. It also considered possible future areas of work and commissioned further work on the need for a centrally co-ordinated policy on refuge provision.

Parkhurst Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many redundancies will be triggered by the implementation of automated security systems at HM prison Parkhurst; and what redundancy settlements he proposes. [392]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of redundancies at Parkhurst prison which may be expected with the implementation of automated security systems there and what redundancy packages have been made.

Automated security systems are an aid to prison security. No staff redundancies at Parkhurst are anticipated from the implementation of such security systems.

Female Prisoners (Maternity Appointments)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Director General of the Prison Service regarding its recent instruction that all female prisoners attending for maternity appointments be handcuffed throughout their care; if he will review this instruction in consultation with relevant organisations including the Royal College of Midwives and the National Childbirth Trust; and if he will make a statement. [317]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Harry Cohen, dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the handcuffing of female prisoners on escort.

For several years escapes by women under escort have been disproportionately high when compared with the number of women prisoners and, therefore, in April of this year, it was decided to handcuff female prisoners under escort in the same way as we have always done for men.

Handcuffs are used to improve security and reduce the risk of escape. Initial indications show that the rate of escape of female prisoners is down by 50 per cent since the new policy was introduced.

For both sexes, handcuffs must be removed if there is a medical, surgical or clinical reason for this. Restraints must always be removed from prisoners during labour and childbirth.

EU Third Pillar Procedures

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedures are followed by the Government for making available to (a) the House and (b) the public the texts of treaties under the EU third pillar procedures, after there has been agreement as to their content; and how soon after such agreement it is intended to make them available in printed published form. [910]

Miss Widdecombe: The Government aim to deposit in the Library copies of unclassified documents which have been adopted or agreed by the Council of Ministers. The texts of conventions concluded in the third pillar are available to the public through the Official Journal of the European Communities, in which they are published after signature. The Government publish the texts of international agreements as command papers for presentation to Parliament as soon as possible after signature.

Privately Managed Prisons

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the studies which have been commissioned by his Department to evaluate the performance of existing privately managed prisons indicating in each case the research body involved and the dates on which (a) each study was commissioned, (b) each study was commenced, (c) he expects to receive reports, and (d) he expects each report to be published; and if he will set out the cost of the studies in each case. [477]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about studies commissioned to evaluate the performance of contractually-managed prisons.

The only such study commissioned to date has been in respect of Wolds prison and was undertaken jointly by the Centre for Criminology and Criminal Justice at Hull University and the Institute of Criminology at the University of Cambridge. This was commissioned on 25 June 1992, and study commenced in July of that year. The research team's formal programme of fieldwork started in January 1993 and was extended to March 1994. The first draft version of the report was received in December 1994, and further revisions to the draft were submitted in April and July of 1995. It is anticipated that the report will be published shortly. The cost of the study was £120,772.

Prisoners (Medical Operations)

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance is given to prison governors in respect of prisoners awaiting medical operations; how many prisoners are currently awaiting operations and what is the average waiting time for such operations. [131]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 22 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about guidance to prison governors in respect of prisoners awaiting medical operations, the number of prisoners awaiting medical operations and the average waiting time for such operations.

No specific advice on prisoners awaiting operations has been issued to governors as the decision to refer a prisoner for a medical operation is a purely clinical one and therefore the responsibility of the medical officer. Information is not collected centrally on how many prisoners are awaiting operations or the average waiting time.

Secretary of State's Speech

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his speech of 12 October to the Conservative party conference was made available to the Home Department press office. [147]

Mr. Howard: On 12 October.

Interception of Communications

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the procedures for authorising the tapping into E-mail and Internet communications and mobile telephone conversations; under what legal authority they are operated; and if he will make a statement. [324]

Mr. Howard: Any communication, including an E-mail, Internet or mobile telephone communication, when it is being transmitted by means of a public telecommunication system, may be intercepted in pursuance of a warrant issued in accordance with the provisions of the Interception of Communications Act 1985.

Suicides

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for (a) England and (b) the United Kingdom the number of suicides; and if he will express this number as a percentage of the overall population for (i) 1971, (ii) 1981, (iii) 1991 and (iv) for each of the last available three years. [998]

Mr. Bowis: I have been asked to reply.

The table shows the number of deaths and death rates per 100,000 population from suicide—ICD 'E950–E959, E980–E989—in England and the United Kingdom in 1971, 1981, 1990, 1991 and 1992.

	England		United Kingdom
	Number	Rater per 100,000	Number	Rate per 100,000
1971	3,739	8.1	5,760	10.3
1981	5,988	12.8	7,192	12.8
1990	5,594	11.7	6,863	11.9
1991	5,567	11.5	6,801	11.8
1992	5,541	11.5	6,863	11.8

The codes E950-E959 refer to deaths where suicide is the underlying cause of death, whereas E980–E989 relate to deaths where it is undetermined whether the injury was accidentally or purposefully inflicted. The majority of these, however, turn out to be suicide.

The deaths for England in 1971 are only those coded to E950–E959, since deaths coded to E980–E989 are not available for England. Deaths coded to E980–E989 are included in the figures for the United Kingdom 1971.

The coding of deaths in England, and Wales was changed in 1993 to an automated system. Though the results from this are generally satisfactory, the OPCS have identified significant problems in the coding of external causes of death. Certifications of deaths in 1993 and 1994 which could have been due to external causes are all being examined and re-coded as necessary. More reliable data, comparable to that for previous years, will be available in the first quarter of 1996.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Security Payments

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the total cost to public funds of increasing in line with earnings all social security payments that have never been upgraded from the date when they were announced. [704]

Mr. Burt: The estimated gross cost is around £1.8 billion at April 1995 prices, rounded to the nearest £100 million.

Fraud

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the contribution to the decline in detected savings in tackling organised methods of payment fraud of (a) a real reduction in fraud and (b) a decline in the detection of fraud. [1105]

Mr. Heald: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave on 26 October 1995, Official Report, column 800.

There is no evidence that investigation work is less successful, and we believe that the reduction in savings is directly attributable to the preventive measures that we have put in place to prevent and deter instrument of payment fraud.

Child Support Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update his answer of 13 June 1995, Official Report, column 492, in respect of benefit savings achieved by the Child Support Agency. [1093]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 22 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about benefit savings.

The table attached covers April to September this year. It shows that the Agency has recorded savings of approximately £195.03 million. The total does not cover Housing Benefit and Council Tax benefit savings which will be calculated later in the year.

Category of benefit savings	Amount £ million
Resulting from pre-CSA assessments:
Paid through Agency collection service to Secretary of State	1.57
Resulting from CSA and pre-CSA assessments:
Paid direct by Absent Parent to Parent with Care	65.69
Resulting from CSA assessments:
Paid through Agency collection service to Secretary of State	30.16
Deductions from Absent Parents' Income support payments	4.18
Income Support claim cessations:
Income Support exceeded rate of benefit	4.30
Income Support claim withdrawn within four weeks of CSA action	80.99
Reductions in Family credit or Disability Working Allowance resulting from CSA assessments	8.14
Housing Benefit/Council tax reductions resulting from CSA assessments	Not available
Total	195.03

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update the monthly breakdown of requirement to co-operate decisions contained in his answer of 26 October 1995, Official Report, columns 805–6, in respect of the Child Support Agency, to include the figures from April 1995 to the most recent month for which figures are available. [1098]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 22 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about requirement to co-operate decisions.

You asked for an update of the monthly breakdown of requirement to co-operate decisions contained in his Answer of 26th October 1995, Official Report, columns 805–6, in respect of the Child Support Agency, to include the figures from April 1995 to the most recent month for which figures are available.

The table below provides a breakdown of the outcome of requirement to co-operate investigations completed during each month between April and September 1995. From April 1995, information is now available on the number of reduced benefit directions actually implemented by Benefits Agency rather than the number issued for implementation. We have included this in the table and hope that you will find it more meaningful.

You may wish to know that the majority of the figures shown in the table are contained in the Child Support Agency Statistical Information which is placed in the Library of the House of Commons each month.

Month	Good Cause Accepted	Absent Parent Named	Good cause not Accepted	Reduced Benefit Direction Implemented	Investigations Completed
April	2,172	490	3,035	2,361	5,697
May	3,119	862	4,212	2,868	8,193
June	3,133	1,584	4,573	2,346	9,290
July	3,289	1,986	4,018	2,011	9,293
August	3,341	2,004	4,331	2,363	9,676
September	3,523	2,312	4,024	2,367	9,859
Total	18,577	9,238	24,193	14,316	52,008

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many telephone calls have been received on the Child Support Agency MP hotline since it started. [1064]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mr. Paddy Tipping, dated 22 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency MP Hotline.

From its launch on 12 December 1993 to 30 September 1995, 5,230 telephone calls have been answered on the Hotline.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the largest back-dated payment required by the Child Support Agency. [122]

Mr. Mitchell: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Asylum Seekers

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated in respect of the effect of the changes to be made on 8 January 1996 on the claiming of benefit by asylum seekers with particular reference to access to housing. [1230]

Mr. Roger Evans: Proposals on social security payments to asylum seekers and other persons from abroad were presented to the Social Security Advisory Committee on 11 October. The committee has carried out a public consultation on these proposals and has received representations from many individuals and organisations, including housing associations and local authorities. The committee is now evaluating those responses and we expect to receive its report in December.

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many sponsored immigrants are subject to a signed undertaking as defined in the Immigration Act 1971 given by another person or persons; how many of them are now receiving (a) income support, (b) housing benefit (c) council tax benefit (d) family credit (e) attendance allowance (f) disability living allowance (g) disability working allowance (h) invalid care allowance and (i) severe disablement allowance, indicating in each case the cost to public funds. [1228]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available in the format requested. Separate details of claims to social security benefits by sponsored immigrants are not collected due to the relatively small size of this group.

It is estimated that nearly a half of sponsored immigrants claim income support and that two-thirds of these may also claim housing benefit and council tax benefit.

Sponsorship undertakings are obtained by the Home Office and copies forwarded to the Benefits Agency. The numbers received in the last three years are set out in the table.

Year	Sponsorship undertakings received
1993	2,121
1994	1,925
1995 (to 20 November 1995)	1,847

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in respect of those who have claimed income support our the last seven years, in how many cases (a) this was due to the death of the sponsor (b) this was due to the sponsor being made bankrupt and (c) this was because the sponsor had become unemployed. [1229]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available.

Interim Payments

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many interim payments have been paid under the Social Security (Payments on Account, Overpayments and Recovery) Regulations 1988 over the last seven years; and how many of these were pending the outcome of an appeal against a benefit refusal. [1231]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Service Code

Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made towards introduction of the proposed civil service code. [2469]

Mr. Freeman: Her Majesty in Council today approved an order extending the functions of the Civil Service Commissioners, empowering them to hear appeals under a civil service code, and to make reports on them.

I shall place a copy of the order in the Libraries of the House as soon as it is available.

Commissioner for Public Appointments

Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made towards the implementation of the Nolan committee's recommendation that a Commissioner for Public Appointments should be appointed. [2470]

Mr. Freeman: Her Majesty in Council today approved orders setting up the office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments and appointing the first office holder.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister today announced the appointment of Sir Leonard Peach, currently chairman of the Police Complaints Authority, as the first Commissioner for Public Appointments. Sir Leonard will take up this part-time appointment on 18 December 1995.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has also appointed Sir Leonard Peach as the Commissioner for Public Appointments in Northern Ireland.

Sir Leonard has also been appointed a Civil Service Commissioner.

I shall arrange for copies of the relevant orders to be placed in the Libraries of the House as soon as they are available.

Central Office of Information

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what his plans are for the future of the Central Office of Information. [2767]

Mr. Freeman: I am satisfied that the Central Office of Information should continue as a next steps agency. I have asked the chief executive to make proposals for improving the efficiency of the agency, with the aim of maximising the value that it adds to the procurement of publicity by Government. The outcome should be to streamline COI so as to concentrate on the procurement of services for customer departments, rather than the direct provision of services. The proposals, which will draw on assistance from consultants, will take full account of the views of customer departments and the availability of alternative means of obtaining the services provided by COI. As a first stage, I have decided that from 1 January 1996 the presumption that departments should use COI for advertisement procurement should cease, and departments will be free to make alternative arrangements direct with the industry if they so wish.

I recognise that these changes will result in some reduction in the number of staff employed by COI, which is currently about 470, but I am convinced that a more sharply focused COI will be better able to provide a service to departments which will both meet the needs of Government Departments and secure the best interests of the taxpayer.

Occupational Health and Safety Agency

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when the Government completed their exploration of how to increase private sector involvement in the Occupational Health and Safety Agency and Recruitment and Assessment Services; and if he will make a statement. [2795]

Mr. Horam: After further consideration in the light of advice from Coopers and Lybrand, the Government have decided to transfer to the private sector both the Occupational Health and Safety Agency and Recruitment and Assessment Services as single viable businesses and in a way that will ensure that they retain their reputation for the provision of high-quality occupational health services and recruitments services respectively. The sale of RAS will include a contract for the fast-stream selection process for future civil servants, specifying the services required. The civil service will retain control over its recruitment.

These agencies have developed well in the last few years, but they are subject to various constraints from having to operate within Government. Privatisation of OHSA and RAS is the best way to secure the long-term interests of the staff and customers of these two businesses, as well as the taxpayer. Once they are freed from these constraints they will be better able to improve their services to existing customers, and to extend their businesses by making their services available to new customers in wider markets.

Formal expressions of interest for these businesses will be sought early in the new year. Financial advisers are being appointed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Nursery Facilities

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what financial provision has been made for the construction of nursery facilities in the Palace of Westminster; and if he will make a statement. [1021]

Mr. Beith: No financial provision has been made for the construction of nursery facilities in the Palace of Westminster. The Commission has from time to time examined the possibilities of establishing an in-House child care facility. However, the Commission has been advised by the Accommodation and Works Committee that the main obstacle is the lack of unallocated accommodation on the Parliamentary estate which is suitable or could be made suitable to comply with the provisions of the Nurseries and Childminders Regulation Act 1948 (as amended 1968).

Telephone and Information Services

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make financial provision for hon. Members to be provided with modern telephone and information services to the level of that available to directors and senior managers in leading British and international corporations. [175]

Mr. Beith: The infrastructure for Members' telephone and information services is provided by the House and Members can augment this by means of the office costs allowance. If the hon. Member has a specific suggestion, he should inform the Chairman of the Administration Committee or the Chairman of the Information Committee.

ENVIRONMENT

Building Regulations

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to introduce new standards under part M of the building regulations, relating to access for people with disabilities. [316]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Over 1,000 responses have been received to the consultation paper on possible changes to part M of the building regulations issued earlier this year. These are being analysed. The Building Regulations

Advisory Committee will consider this analysis in due course and will make recommendations to Ministers on the way forward.

Environmental Technology Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how often he holds meetings with ministerial colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry with the specific intention of promoting the growth of the environmental industry. [1167]

Mr. Clappison: The Secretary of State and the President of the Board of Trade established the joint environmental markets unit following a meeting they held with the Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment. This DTI-DOE unit assists and encourages United Kingdom firms to exploit growing markets for environmental goods and services, on an on-going basis, and Ministers discuss the issues that arise as a result of the unit's work as and when required.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how often he has met his European counterparts to discuss the environmental technology industry across Europe in the last 12 months. [1155]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend has frequent meetings with his European counterparts to discuss a wide range of measures to improve environmental standards. The improvement of such standards will tend to create market opportunities for suppliers of environmental technology and services. Among the many matters discussed at Environment Councils attended by my right hon. Friend in the past 12 months has been the proposed amendment of the LIFE regulation, part of which the aim is to provide financial support for projects demonstrating an innovative use of environmental technology.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the level of tax revenue the environmental technology industry has contributed to the Treasury in the past five years. [1166]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what formal arrangements exist to assist co-operation between his Department and the Department for Education and Employment in relation to the environment technology industry. [1156]

Mr. Clappison: There are no such arrangements specifically related to the environmental technology industry. However, there is close co-operation between the Departments on improvement of the environmental content of education at all levels from primary school to university, and on development of environmental national vocational qualifications. This will promote greater environmental awareness among today's and tomorrow's industrial management and work force, and so in turn improve the climate for the environmental supply industry.

Temporary Accommodation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of Start for the Environment what is the average annual cost to a local authority of keeping a family of four in (a) local authority accommodation and (b) temporary bed and breakfast accommodation. [1196]

Mr. Curry: The information requested is not available.

Coal Mining Accidents

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of (a) fatal and (b) serious reportable accidents per 100.000 manshifts recorded by companies contracted to the main deep coal mining operators. [1176]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not available. The Health and Safety Executive does not compile accident rates for comparing contractors to the main deep coal mine operators.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of (a) fatal and (b) serious reportable accidents per 100.000 manshifts in the deep coal mining industry in the fist 10 months of (i) 1995 and (ii) 1994. [1174]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information is not yet available for 1995.

Information for 1994 is as follows:

	Fatal	Major injury
1 January 1994–31 December 1994	0.05	3.01

Health and Safety Laboratory

Mr. Marland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Health and Safety Executive has begun its review of the health and safety laboratory. [2401]

Sir Paul Beresford: Following the efficiency scrutiny of public sector research establishments and the Government response, Cm 2991, a prior options review of the health and safety laboratory is now under way. The review is being led by HSE's chief scientist, Dr. J. McQuaid. It is due to be completed by March 1996.

Empty Government Property

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what targets have been set to reduce the number of empty Government homes. [2797]

Mr. Curry: The Government are determined to cut the number of empty homes, whether they are owned by local councils, housing associations, private individuals or Whitehall Departments. An empty home is a wasted asset.

Last year nearly 4,000 empty Government homes were brought back into use or sold. We are now building on the progress already made by setting targets for 1995–96 that aim to reduce the number of empty properties and the length of time that they remain empty.

The targets are as follows:

Department	Total stock (1 April 1995)	Empty (1 April 1995)	Empty as percentage (1 April 1995)	Target for percentage empty (1 April 1996)	Target for percentage empty for more than six months that could be lived in or made habitable[1] (1 April 1996)
Department of Transport	3,511	1,028	29.7	[2]<25	<9
Home Office	4,023	455	11.3	<11	<3
Scottish Office	1,481 [3]251	162 [3]44	10.9 [3]17.5	— [2, 3]<10	— [3]<3

Notes:
[1] Properties that "could be lived in or made habitable" includes all properties except:
(a) derelict properties that await demolition (e.g. to make way for road schemes);
(b) those that are expected to be demolished in the near future where the expenditure required to make them habitable would be disproportionate to their expected life (e.g. where substantial investment would be required to connect essential services, such as water, sewage or electricity);
(c) those that cannot be made accessible (e.g. due to adjacent construction work).
[2] The Department of Transport target for percentage empty that could be lived in or made habitable (as defined in note [1] above) is <15 per cent. On the same basis, the target for Scottish Office is <3 per cent.
[3] Excludes NHS properties in England and Scotland. These are surveyed every two or three years. A survey in England is in progress now, and when the results are available targets will be set to cover the period until the next surveys.

Central Manchester Development Corporation

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when Central Manchester development corporation will be wound up; and if he will make a statement. [2799]

Mr. Curry: Statutory orders will be laid before Parliament early next year to effect the wind up and dissolution of Central Manchester development corporation. Subject to parliamentary approval, the corporation will cease to act from 1 April 1996, except for the purpose of preparing its final accounts and report and winding up its affairs. The corporation will be dissolved on 1 July 1996.

Urban development corporations were set up, with finite lifetimes, to regenerate their designated areas. Since designation on 30 June 1988, Central Manchester development corporation has encouraged and grant aided private sector development and undertaken substantial environmental improvements, which have helped to stimulate new jobs and new life in the city.

By the end of its lifetime, the corporation expects to have reclaimed 39 hectares of land, created 194,000 sqm of commercial floor space, 2,730 housing units, 6,400 permanent jobs and attracted £370 million of private sector investment. The corporation has transformed large parts of the city, which will continue to benefit well into the next century.

Council Tax

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the effect of a 4 per cent. increase in council tax on (a) the total yield of council tax in Great Britain, (b) the total yield of council tax in England, (c) the average bill in England, (d) council tax benefit, (e) the retail prices index and (f) index linked benefits. [1478]

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 21 November 1995]: The information relating to Wales and Scotland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Scotland.

If council taxes in England had increased in 1995–96 by an additional 4 per cent. compared with actual levels, the approximate effect is estimated as follows:

(b) Gross yield of council tax: increase of £890 million.

(c) Average Band C bill, before Council Tax Benefit or Transitional Relief: increase from £541 to £563.

(d) Council tax benefit: increase of £85 million.

(e) The increase would add around 0.1 percentage points to the percentage change over 12 months in the all items retail prices index.

(f) The precise effect on those benefits linked to the retail prices index would depend on whether this marginal change was sufficient to trigger an increase in benefit levels. As an approximate guide, an additional 0.1 percentage points on the rate of inflation would add around £40 million to the cost of those benefits in a full year. There would be no effect on those income related benefits which are usually linked to the Rossi index.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Research Establishments

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the forthcoming prior options reviews of MAFF research establishments. [2474]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government announced on 29 September 1995 that all public sector research establishments would be subject to prior options reviews, and that a timetable would be made available shortly.

The Central Science Laboratory, Horticulture Research International and the Directorate of Fisheries Research will be reviewed immediately. The R and D conducted by ADAS will be reviewed on the same timetable. The Veterinary Laboratories Agency will be reviewed between early next year and July 1996.

MAFF establishments will be reviewed alongside establishments parented or sponsored by other Government Departments which are carrying out work in similar or related fields.

Comments from interested parties would be welcome. These should be sent to:

T. D. Rossington
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
Room 806
Nobel House
17 Smith Square
London
SW1P 3JR

Comments on the Central Science Laboratory, Horticulture Research International, the Directorate of Fisheries Research and ADAS research and development should be sent by 8 January 1996. Comments on the Veterinary Laboratories Agency should be sent by 1 April 1996.

Animal Species

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to make a report on his consultations with legal experts and scientists about Torry research and development projects, and the Bartlett-Davidson patent relating to patenting of DNA nucleotides sequencing for identification of animal species; and if he will make a statement. [59]

Mrs. Browning: I am still not in a position to make a statement.

Valley Factory, Rhydymwyn

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was his Department's financial contribution to the Drivers Jonas report and the joint report with Delyn borough council and the Welsh Development Agency on the valley factory at Rhydymwyn, Clwyd. [595]

Mr. Boswell: The Ministry's financial contribution to Dames and Moore and Drivers Jonas for the preparation of the environmental assessment was approximately £65,000. The current site remediation study with Delyn borough council and the Welsh Development Agency will be jointly funded by the Ministry and the WDA. It has been agreed that the Ministry and the WDA will each bear one half of the total cost of the assessment. The Ministry's share is likely to amount to around £50,000. It has further been agreed that the Ministry and the WDA will each recompense one half of Delyn borough council's reasonable staff costs incurred in this study. Estimated costs are not yet available.

Farmers' Wives

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will commission a study into the social and economic role played by farmers' wives; and if he will make a statement. [58]

Mr. Boswell: The important role played by farmers' spouses in farming enterprises is widely and very fully acknowledged within the industry and elsewhere. We doubt that a study of the kind suggested would do other than reinforce that view and have no plans for one at present.

Grant Payments (Fraud)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, to date and by region, the number of farmers who have been prosecuted for alleged criminal fraud in respect of payments of grants for renovating hedgerows and banks; what has been the result of the prosecutions; what effect unsuccessful prosecutions have had on subsequent grant payments; and if he will make a statement. [60]

Mr. Boswell: Earlier this year, a group of 19 cases in the south-west involving false claims for grant on hedges under the farm and conservation grant scheme were listed for prosecution. Two of these cases were heard by the Crown court. They resulted in acquittals. In the second of these cases, it was held that there was insufficient evidence to prove criminal dishonesty. In the light of this, the remaining 17 cases were withdrawn. However, where, as in these cases, grant has been claimed in breach of the scheme's rules, we will seek to recover grant to which farmers are not entitled. We are taking action to do so. Other grant claims from the farmers concerned will be dealt with on their own merits in the usual way.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many sheep and lambs have been exported to date this year to (a) the Netherlands and (b) Belgium; and how many sheep and lambs were exported to each of these two countries in (i) 1993 and (ii) 1994. [1604]

Mr. Boswell: For the purposes of trade statistics, Belgium and Luxembourg are treated as one single entity. Official overseas trade statistics for the number of live sheep and lambs exported from the United Kingdom to the Netherlands and Belgium-Luxembourg are as follows:

Thousand head

	1993	[1]1994	1995 January to July [1,2]
Netherlands	41	95	12
Belgium-Luxembourg	109	128	17

[1] Provisional.
[2] Exports of live sheep and lambs to the Netherlands and Belgium-Luxembourg are highly seasonal. Therefore January to July figures, the best available, should not be considered indicative of the eventual annual totals for 1995.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1442]

Mr. Boswell: For the Department's performance for the years 1990–91 to 1993–94, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given on 17 May 1995, Official Report, column 260. In 1994–95 MAFF's energy costs per square metre for the main estate rose by 3 per cent. above the 1990–91 base year figure, compared with an increase of 5 per cent. in 1993–94. Energy costs for laboratories increased by 29 per cent. and those for the depots decreased by 26 per cent. from the base year figures.

Under the returns for Government's energy campaign, the Department cannot discount the IT equipment that has been installed throughout MAFF since 1990–91; or the new research buildings—which are high energy users—required to meet statutory requirements at our laboratories, replacing rudimentary predecessors; or the growth in business activities.

The Department continues to take steps aimed at reducing energy consumption through the investment of energy schemes and the promotion of awareness campaigns for staff.

Potato Imports (Brown Rot)

Mr. Harris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, if he will make a statement on Government action to be taken to deal with imports of potatoes infected with brown rot. [2389]

Mr. Boswell: Measures have been adopted at Community level to deal with the reported outbreak of brown rot in the Netherlands. They place stringent requirements on the Dutch authorities to ensure the safe disposal of potatoes from infected farms. To supplement these measures, the Government have introduced a statutory requirement for prior notification of all intended imports of Dutch potatoes—including seed, ware and potatoes for processing—in order to ensure that this trade can be monitored effectively. The legislation has also been strengthened to give wider powers to inspectors to control the disposal of Dutch potatoes, and we will be maintaining a high level of surveillance on this trade through inspections of consignments and laboratory testing.

Deregulation

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the deregulation measures agreed by his Department during 1995. [284]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 22 November 1995]: The Ministry has a positive and long-standing commitment to deregulation, which has been developed during 1995. The Agricultural Tenancies Act 1995 greatly simplified the rules relating to agricultural tenancies and now enables landlords and tenants to agree terms which reflect their own particular needs. Two draft deregulation orders, under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, have been laid to lift reporting burdens under the Corn Returns Act 1882 and in relation to slaughterhouses legislation. Other deregulatory measures include reducing the requirements relating to marking of pigs and simplifying the arrangements for licensing of poultry slaughtermen. Steps have also been taken to exempt cold stores handling packaged meat from meat inspection regulations. By 1 January 1996, we expect to repeal or simplify a significant series of national measures relating to food composition and food additives.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 23 November. [1490]

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will discuss with President Clinton on his forthcoming visit to Britain, the issue of supporting a trial, in the Hague, under Scottish rules of evidence, under a Scottish judge, of the Libyan suspects accused of the bombing of Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie. [1633]

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so.

National Lottery

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister what considerations led him to commit national lottery funds to the development of competitive sport. [1795]

The Prime Minister: National lottery funds are not committed or distributed by the Government. Parliament decided that 20 per cent. of the funds for good causes should go to sport. The sports councils decide how much of that should go to the development of competitive sport.

French Nuclear Tests

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters he has received (a) supporting and (b) opposing his views on the French Government's nuclear tests which are currently taking place. [1667]

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 20 November, Official Report, column 25.

TRANSPORT

Oil Spillages

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to reduce oil spillages at sea. [120]

Mr. Norris: My Department devotes considerable resources to reducing oil discharges at sea through the enforcement of international discharge regulations, the detection of vessels which breach those regulations and the deterrence of illegal discharges. We are also working with the International Maritime Organisation to make the discharge requirements more stringent.

Driving Licences

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the possibility of including photographs on the driving licence; and what plans he has to do so. [1488]

Mr. Norris: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Bar (Mr. Rooker) on 16 October, Official Report, column 73.

Railways (Expenditure)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the last five years the total amount of subsidy to the rail system; and what is his projection for each of the next five years. [50]

Mr. Watts: Regarding the total amount of subsidy in the last five years. I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) on 7 November 1995 Official Report, column 769.

The level of public funding needed for the railways in the next five years will depend on the bids for franchises received by the franchising director. The Government believe that privatisation will bring improvements to efficiency and services. All these factors will affect the level of funding required by the railways.

Truck Access Grants

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of applications he has received for track access grants for services in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales; and if he will indicate what number he has approved. [1227]

Mr. Watts: We have received 14 track access grant applications. Five were for traffic in England, four for Scotland and five for Wales. One has been approved. Two applications have been rejected and one withdrawn.

Light Rail Funding

Mr. Sheldon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on light rail funding; and what assessment he has made of the benefits of Greater Manchester passenger transport authority's plans to extend Metrolink to Ashton under Lyne via the proposed national stadium site. [1746]

Mr. Norris: The Government fund light rail schemes out of the budget for local transport schemes, through the package approach. A separate budget for light rail does not exist, and such schemes can proceed only at the expense of other transport projects, both in the same area and in other parts of the country.

My support of light rail schemes is dependent on the following: whether the scheme can be demonstrated to be the right and most cost-effective solution to a particular urban transport problem; whether it has been planned within the context of a strategy or transport package to achieve mode shift away from the private car; and whether it will attract private sector investment. It should be remembered, however, that light rail is not the only solution to urban transport problems, and the difficulties and costs associated with developing schemes should not be underestimated.

We have not yet seen the economic case for the Metrolink extension to Ashton under Lyne, and I understand that Greater Manchester passenger transport executive has yet to apply for powers for this scheme under the Transport and Works Act 1992. Any progress with this extension will depend on the priority attached to it by the Greater Manchester local authorities and the availability of resources.

Railfreight Distribution

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is considering a joint public-private venture for Railfreight Distribution as an alternative to privatisation; and if he will make a statement. [1463]

Mr. Watts: No.

Railway Timetables

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what provisions exist for ensuring that local bus operators are informed as early as possible of changes to railway timetables. [383]

Mr. Watts: The provision of railway timetable information to bus operators is a matter for train operators and Railtrack. The railway industry is planning the development of a comprehensive national train information service intended to deliver accurate, consistent and impartial information services which will be available to third parties.

Passenger Rail Services

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies his Department has commissioned into the relative costs of operating passenger railway services (a) by the franchises, (b) by the British Railways Board. [1273]

Mr. Watts: No studies have been commissioned. The franchising director has statutory responsibility for awarding franchises. In doing so he must satisfy a number of statutory duties and objectives, including the requirements to ensure good value for money in the provision of franchised services and to encourage competition in the railway industry.

Severn Bridge (Tolls)

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will express the average toll charge per mile for a car in respect of the new Severn bridge crossing; and if he will make a statement. [236]

Mr. Watts [holding answer 21 November 1995]: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Charles Kennedy, dated 23 November 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about average toll charges per mile for a car in respect of the new Severn bridge crossing.

The toll charges for the new Severn crossing will be the same as for the existing Severn bridge. For Category 1 Vehicles, that is motor cars and motor caravans, the toll charge per vehicle is at present £3.70. From 1 January 1996 the toll charge for motor cars will increase to £3.80 per vehicle.

The toll level is not generally expressed as a charge per mile. However, the new Severn crossing, which is due to open in 1996, will be approximately 3 miles long and the average charge per mile for cars will therefore be about £1.27.

I hope this is helpful.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Aid for Trade Provisions

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact on the British economy of that overseas aid which is tied to purchase of British goods; and if he will make a statement. [1540]

Mr. Hanley: We have recently conducted an assessment of the impact on the British economy of that overseas aid procurement which is tied to purchase of British goods. The assessment concluded that the overall impact was very small. The United Kingdom will remain at the forefront of efforts to encourage untying on a multilateral basis.

Least Developed Countries

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of (a) bilateral and (b) multilateral aid the United Kingdom allocates to those least developed countries which have a per capita gross national product of less than $750 US per year. [1550]

Mr. Hanley: It is not practicable to allocate aid channelled through multilateral agencies, nor some bilateral aid—notably block grants to NGOs and other agencies—to specific recipient countries.

Of United Kingdom 1994–95 bilateral aid which can be allocated to countries, for all recipients, both developing and transitional:

36 per cent. went to countries on the UN's list of Least developed countries (LLDCs)

69 per cent. went to low income countries (defined as those with per capita incomes of less than US$676 in 1992)

For developing country recipients only the equivalent figures are 38 per cent. and 73 per cent. respectively.

GDP (Overseas Aid)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of annual gross domestic product the United Kingdom spent on overseas aid in each year since 1985. [1547]

Mr. Hanley: The ratio normally used to relate aid to the size of the economy is net official development assistance as a percentage of gross national product. Figures for the United Kingdom since 1985 are as follows:

Year	UK net oda as a percentage of GNP
1985	0.33
1986	0.31
1987	0.28
1988	0.32
1989	0.31
1990	0.27
1991	0.32
1992	0.31
1993	0.31
1994	0.31

Sri Lanka

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures have been taken by the international community to provide humanitarian assistance to Tamil people in the Jaffna peninsula of Sri Lanka. [1618]

Mr. Hanley: The international community is supporting the efforts of those relief agencies providing emergency shelter, health, water and sanitation, and supplementing food rations to those affected by the conflict. With regard to the United Kingdom's contribution, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) on 22 November Official Report, column 111. In addition, the UK share of recent European Community emergency aid is some £138,000.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1443]

Mr. Hanley: We are actively pursuing an energy efficiency implementation programme with a view to meeting the Government's aim to reduce energy consumption by 15 per cent. by March 1996. Measured by input over output, a reduction of 11.85 per cent. of electricity consumption and 15 per cent. of gas consumption has been achieved from 1990 to March 1995.

European Court of Human Rights

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many judgments handed down by the European Court of Human Rights have gone (a) in favour of and (b) against each member country; and if he will make a statement. [1525]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: A list containing the information requested follows:

Guatemala

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the British contribution to the MINUGUA UN mission in Guatemala; and what is his policy towards the future of this mission. [1623]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The MINUGUA mission is funded from the UN regular budget. The United Kingdom contribution to MINUGUA, based on our assessed contributions, will be approximately US$ 1.4 million for the period 1 October 1994 to 31 December 1995.

The UK co-sponsored a resolution at the UN General Assembly on 14 September 1995 to extend MINUGUA by six months, until 18 March 1996.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent meetings diplomatic officials have held with human rights and political groupings in Sri Lanka. [1620]

Mr. Hanley: British diplomatic officials in London and Colombo have frequent contacts with human rights organisations and a wide range of political parties and groups.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Royal Ordnance

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what investigation his Department has made into the allegation made in a German court that Royal Ordnance staff provided false end-user certificates for the German company Heckler and Koch, prior to its purchase of the company, and re-exported the guns abroad; and if he will make a statement. [1143]

Mr. Oppenheim: The allegations made during the court case, including that referred to by the hon. Member, were pursued with Royal Ordnance and assurances were received from the company to the satisfaction of my Department.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1395]

Mr. Lang: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister.

My Department's records show that, since April 1992, 22 public interest immunity certificates have been signed by Ministers of this Department, five of which did not need to be deployed. The annual breakdown is as follows:

1992: 4 (from April)

1993: 8

1994: 6

1995: 4 (to date)

No central record is kept of certificates issued before April 1992.

The certificates were issued to protect a range of classes of information, in particular the formulation of Government policy, the internal dealings of Government Departments, the operation of the Security and Intelligence Services, and confidential information and advice obtained in connection with the Department's regulatory or statutory functions.

Sustainable Energy

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is his policy to require companies taking over regional electricity companies' assurances in respect of the protection of small companies generating electricity by sustainable means; and what assurances have so far been given. [1606]

Mr. Eggar: The five-year transitional arrangements for those generators which supplied regional electricity companies under extended Energy Act terms ended in March 1995. A public electricity supplier's obligation under the non-fossil fuel obligation are not affected by changes in the ownership of that public electricity supplier.

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures he is taking to protect small independent companies generating electricity by sustainable means following the opening up of the electricity market. [1605]

Mr. Eggar: Those renewable generating stations with NFFO contracts will not be affected by the liberalisation of the electricity market until their NFFO contracts with the regional electricity companies end. Renewable generating stations without NFFO contracts will have the opportunity to benefit from the freedom to supply end-users in small niche markets, at a price that may be related to the electricity retail price as opposed to the wholesale price at which licensed electricity suppliers purchase electricity. I understand that OFFER and the electricity pool are considering the possibility of simplified arrangements to enable embedded generators to sell electricity without the requirement to become pool members.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the number of potential insider dealing offences (a) considered by the stock exchange surveillance group, (b) referred by that group to his Department, (c) investigated or prosecuted by his Department or by the stock exchange and (d) resulting in a conviction in each year since 1988. [541]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The information sought by the hon. Member is contained in my Department's report on companies published annually by HMSO. For convenience I provide a compendium of information derived from reports from 1988–89 to 1994–95. The stock exchange reviews transactions ahead of all price-sensitive announcements on a routine basis. Where evidence of insider dealing is suspected a referral is made to the Department. The tables include such referrals.

Chemical Weapons Bill

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the names of those individuals or organisations making representations to his Department on the draft Chemical Weapons Bill; and if he will place all such representations except for parts that may be commercially confidential in the Library. [538]

Mr. Oppenheim: On 19 July my Department circulated 500 copies of a draft Bill, and invited comments. A revised draft Bill, taking account of all the views received, was published on 2 November.

In general, industry representatives indicated that they were in agreement with the provisions of the Bill. Other views emphasised the need for the operations of the DTI as national authority to be transparent, that it should be accountable, and that the Crown should be bound by the provisions of the Bill. However, those people and organisations who responded had no reason to expect that their names, or individual views, would be made public. In view of this it would not be proper to place their representations in the Library of the House.

Environmental Research

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what his Department has spent on research and development within the environmental industry in each year since 1992–93. [1160]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Department has supported research and development on technologies with a specific environmental function as follows:

	£ million
1992–93	2.09
1993–94	2.05
1994–95	1.49
Total	5.63

In the same period my Department spent £69.9 million on new and renewable technologies and £19.7 million on clean coal technologies.

Some of the research and development supported under general DTI programmes, such as SMART—small firms merit award for research and technology—SPUR—support for products under research—Link and EUREKA, and through the OST's funding of the research councils, will also be relevant to the environmental technology industries.

National Phoneday

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions officials of his Department have had with British Telecom relating to the impact of national phoneday on the service being delivered to users of the telephone network. [1743]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Numbering issues are the responsibility of the Director General of Telecommunications. My officials have not met BT to discuss the impact of the phoneday changes.

Telephone Dialling Codes

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what figures his Department has received from British Telecom relating to the number of users of the telephone network making calls erroneously using the old national dialling codes; and if he will make it his policy for these figures to be published. [1742]

Mr. Taylor: My Department has not received any figures from BT relating to the number of wrongly dialled calls. Any decision on a policy of publishing such figures would be a matter for the Director General of Telecommunications. However, OFTEL has conducted a customer survey which revealed that the vast majority, 85 per cent. of those surveyed, did not find the changes a significant problem.

Poppy Appeal

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the prevention of sub-post offices from selling British Legion scratchcards for the poppy appeal. [1002]

Mr. Oppenheim: This is an operational matter for the Post Office.

Pearl Assurance

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what investigations his Department is carrying out into complaints made against Pearl Assurance's handling of insurance claims. [123]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Department does not comment on matters relating to individual companies.

Exports

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what Government financial assistance is available to exporters of (a) civilian goods and (b) military equipment. [1568]

Mr. Oppenheim: My Department, together with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, offers a full range of assistance of all types to exporting companies through Overseas Trade Services. Details of these services are contained in the British Overseas Trade Board's annual report and forward plan, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. In addition, support to civil and military exporters is available through the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is the practice of his Department to make an assessment of the loss of earnings by British exporters, excluding military equipment, which may be caused as a result of war or internal conflict. [1569]

Mr. Oppenheim: My Department, together with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, alerts British exporters to potential difficulties in repatriation of export earnings that may occur as a result of war or internal conflicts abroad. Further action is then a matter for the individual companies. We have no central figures for the total amount involved in loss of earnings as a result of such actions.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Pearson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many awards of regional selective assistance, and of what value, have been made to firms in the Dudley metropolitan borough in each of the past five years. [581]

Mr. Oppenheim: The number of offers, and value of regional selective assistance made to businesses in the Dudley metropolitan borough over the past five years is shown in the table:

Local authority district—Dudley	Number of approvals	Grant approved £ thousands
1 April 1990–31 March 1991	30	1,325
1 April 1991–31 March 1992	19	693
1 April 1992–31 March 1993	16	616
1 April 1993–31 March 1994	22	1,175
1 April 1994–31 March 1995	33	1,253

In the current year the number of offers and value of assistance has been:

Local authority district—Dudley	Number of approvals	Grant approved £ thousands
1 April 1995 to 31 October 1995	31	1,184

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what sum was originally provided for regional selective assistance in 1994–95; and what was the eventual figure. [1327]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 21 November 1995]: The estimate for regional selective assistance in 1994–95 was £101.2 million. Actual expenditure was £113.1 million.

The figures are available respectively in the Government's expenditure plans 1995–96 to 1997–98 and the Industrial Development Act annual report.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [41]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The following Acts of Parliament that affect local government have been introduced by this Department since January 1994:

The Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994

The Coal Industry Act 1994

The Trade Marks Act 1994

The Gas Act 1995

Nigeria

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the dates and location of conferences supported by the British Government to encourage British investment and trade with Nigeria since 18 November 1993; what plans his Department has to support further events in Nigeria or in Britain; and if he will make a statement on his Department's support for such ventures in the future. [1207]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 21 November 1995]: Officials of my Department have taken part in seminars on trading with Nigeria since 18 November 1993 that have been organised by the following:

February 1994: Bristol Chamber of Commerce

May 1994: Kent Export Forum

August 1994: Sheffield Mining Forum

October 1994: London Chamber of Commerce/BEAMA

November 1994: Thames Valley Export Forum

June 1995: Thames Valley Export Forum

July 1995: Energy Council

October 1995: Nigeria-British Chamber of Commerce.

My Department has also organised within this time five general "Opportunity Africa" seminars which have featured presentations on Nigeria.

Support has been offered to the London, Bristol and Kent chambers of commerce for outward missions to Nigeria planned for next year.

My Department has scaled down the level of its promotional activity in recent years because of the political and economic situation in Nigeria. We will continue to keep the level of activity under review. However, it remains our policy to support UK companies in their efforts to secure business in what remains an important market.

Patent Office

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the consultants currently engaged in examining the work of the Patent Office indicating the cost of each of the studies involved. [1202]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 21 November 1995]: Two firms of consultants are engaged by the Patent Office to help on possible contractorisation projects. They are Marketing Improvements Group plc and Coopers and Lybrand. The total cost of this work to date is £108,945 plus expenses. The three projects are the Office's information technology services, its marketing and awareness programmes, and the operations of its London front office. The overall annual costs of these are £5.888 million, £1.608 million and £1.125 million respectively.

EU Industry Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Union Industry Council, held on 6 to 7 November listing all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [439]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 20 November 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) on 21 November 1995, Official Report, column 71.

Manufacturing Employment

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of total manufacturing employment in the United Kingdom was in foreign-owned companies in each year since 1974. [1516]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 22 November 1995]: The information required is given in the following list:

Percentage of United Kingdom manufacturing employment in foreign-owned companies:

1975: 13.0

1977: 14.7

1979: 15.0

1981: 14.9

1983: 14.5

1884: 14.8

1985: 14.0

1986: 13.0

1987: 13.4

1988: 13.1

1989: 14.9
1990: 16.1
1991: 17.2
1992: 18.1

Note:
1992 figures are the latest available.
Prior to 1983 figures were only collected bi-annually.

Source
Annual Census of Production: CSO Business Monitor PA1002.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of total manufacturing employment was in foreign-owned companies in each of the EU and OECD countries in the latest available year. [1517]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 November 1995]: According to the annual census of production 18 per cent. of United Kingdom manufacturing employment was attributed to foreign-owned companies in 1992, the latest year for which data are available. No comparable data are available for other EU and OECD countries.

Departmental Staffing

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff employed in his Department are (a) on short-term contracts, (b) employed for less than a year, (c) employed in the press office and (d) employed in his private offices. [1514]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 November 1995]: On 1 October 1995 my Department employed 435 staff on short-term contracts—employed on a casual basis for up to a period of 12 months, but exceptionally up to two years. There are currently 243 staff who have been employed for less than a year, including staff on loan from other Government Departments but excluding staff in this category who transferred from the Department of Employment and Cabinet Office as part of the machinery of Government changes announced on 5 July 1995. There are currently 28 staff employed in the press office and 53 staff employed in Ministers' private offices.

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff his Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region, what is the cost of running these regional operations, what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [269]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 November 1995]: Disaggregated information on the basis of standard English regions is not available. However, information on the Department of Trade and Industry's regional staff in Government offices for the regions and related budgets and activities is provided in GO MINIS 1, copies of which were placed in the Library of the House in July 1995.

Coal Mines (Accidents)

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the number of (a) fatal and (b) serious reportable accidents per 100,000 manshifts recorded by each of the coal companies operating deep mines which were previously publicly owned in the first 10 months of 1995. [1175]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have been asked to reply.

The Health and Safety Executive does not compile accident rates for individual companies or mines.

Temazepam

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what requirements a pharmaceutical wholesaler must fulfil in order to obtain an export licence for Temazepam. [1538]

Mr. Maclean: I have been asked to reply.

Additional controls to prevent diversion from the legitimate trade in Temazepam will be introduced shortly. These will include a requirement for import and export licences.

Emergency Admissions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what change has occurred in respect of the level of emergency admissions to hospitals in the current year; and if he will make a statement. [1152]

Mr. Sackville: I have been asked to reply.

The latest year for which figures are available is 1993–94. In that year, total admissions were 8,286,515, of which 3,833,498—46.3 per cent.—were emergency admissions. In 1992–93, total admissions were 7,873,219, of which 3,640,896—46.2 per cent.—were emergency admissions.

DEFENCE

Army Training

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about his plans for the support and administration of the Army's training areas and ranges. [2476]

Mr. Soames: As part of the Government's competing for quality programme, the Commander-in-Chief Land Command has initiated a study into the way in which administration and support services are provided to the 100 or so Army training areas and ranges in England, Scotland and Wales for which he is responsible. The aim of the study is to explore the extent to which these support services might be provided more efficiently and at a reduced cost as a result of being exposed to competition. The study will last for about six months and its results will be reported to the House.

HMS Renown

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the current cost per annum of maintaining HMS Renown; and if he will make a statement on her future; [2057]

(2) where HMS Renown is currently stationed. [2058]

Mr. Soames: The cost of operating HMS Renown in 1994–95, the last year for which figures are available, was approximately £29 million. This figure includes the cost of manpower, maintenance and stores. Renown is no longer required to form part of our deterrent force and will in due course move from her current berth at Faslane to Rosyth to await decommissioning.

Army Surgeons

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of regular Army surgeons required to meet current commitments; [2056]

(2) what is his estimate for the total number of Army surgeons who will be employed by his Department in each of the next five years. [2055]

Mr. Soames: The number of trained deployable Regular Army surgeons—comprising the disciplines of general surgery, opthalmics, burns and plastics, maxillo-facial and ear, nose and throat—oto-rhino-laryngology—required to meet current commitments is 55. Although it is not possible to predict the precise number of surgeons who will be employed in each of the next five years, all practicable steps will be taken to ensure that our requirements are fully met.

Ships (Target Practice)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the ships which are currently being considered for target practice. [1825]

Mr. Soames: All vessels on the disposal lists are available to be considered for use as a target. Decisions on whether ships will be used for target practice are made in the light of all relevant factors, including the operational requirement for such trials and the costs involved.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will name the ships which have been used for target practice in each of the last five years. [1824]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 16 December 1994, Official Report, column 816. I can confirm that no vessels have been used for target practice since then.

Ship Deployments

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the latest deployment of (a) HMS Kent, (b) HMS Hermione and (c) HMS Jupiter. [1826]

Mr. Soames: HMS Kent's last operational deployment was in an exercise in the eastern Atlantic in the spring of 1980. She then became the fleet training ship (static) in Portsmouth harbour from June 1980 to March 1983. Following that she became the cadet forces accommodation and training ship from March 1983 until March 1993. She was then placed on the disposal list.

HMS Jupiter's last operational deployment was in the south Atlantic from October 1991 to February 1992. She returned to the UK via the West Indies, arriving on 31 March 1992. She was placed on the disposal list on 1 May 1992.

HMS Hermione's last operational deployment was on Armilla patrol from October 1991 to February 1992. She returned to the UK via the Mediterranean, arriving on 26 March 1992. She was decommissioned on 30 June 1992 and then placed on the disposal list.

All three vessels remain on the disposal list.

Military Assistance (Guatemala)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Guatemalan officers are being trained in Britain; what courses they are following; and at what establishment the courses are based. [1342]

Mr. Soames: Details of the military assistance provided to other countries are confidential between Governments.

Jaguar Aircraft

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Jaguar aircraft are to be upgraded to GR.1B standard; and if he will list the additional capabilities of the GR.1B aircraft. [1289]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We plan to have upgraded all 65 Jaguar GR aircraft to GR1B standard by mid-1997. This upgrade improves the operational effectiveness of Jaguar, and provides a TIALD—thermal imaging and laser designation—capability.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF Jaguar aircraft are to be upgraded with the Adour 804 engine; what is the cost of the programme; and what is the planned service entry date for (a) the first and (b) the last such upgraded aircraft. [1290]

Mr. Arbuthnot: A proposal to upgrade the Jaguar Adour Mk 104 engine is being considered.

Nuclear-free Zone (South Pacific)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of the verification regime to police the South Pacific nuclear-free zone treaty. [1504]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We have announced our intention to sign the protocols to the treaty of Raratonga which was drawn up by the South Pacific states. The treaty's control regime provides for information exchanges, consultations, a complaints procedure and the conclusion of safeguards agreements with the International Atomic Energy Authority in respect of peaceful nuclear activities. The Government have full confidence in the effectiveness of the IAEA safeguards system and its ability to detect diversion of nuclear material from the purposes declared for it.

Technical Co-operation Programme

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many technical panels and action groups currently exist within sub-group E of the technical co-operation programme between Britain, the United States of America, Australia, New Zealand and Canada; and what is the remit of each of these technical panels and action groups. [1559]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Sub-group E of the technical co-operation programme currently contains four technical panels and three action groups. The titles, which describe the remits of each panel and action group are as follows:

ETP4—Medical Countermeasures against biological agents

ETP9—Hazard Assessment

ETP10—Detection of biological agents

ETP11—Low burden, integrated protective clothing

EAG38—Gene Probes

EAG39—Medical Countermeasures against vesicant agents

EAG40—Adsorbents.

Air Crews (Secondment)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on plans to provide Tornado aircraft, with Royal Air Force crews on secondment, to the United Arab Emirates. [1303]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My department has no current plans to provide Tornado aircraft, with Royal Air Force crews on secondment, to the United Arab Emirates.

However, British Aerospace is among the competitors to meet the United Arab Emirates' next combat aircraft requirement and its bid has the full and active support of Her Majesty's Government.

Harrier Aircraft

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force Harrier GR.7 aircraft have had their inertial navigation system modified to 1075G standard; what plans he has to apply this modification to the entire Harrier GR.7 fleet; and what is the total cost of the programme. [1287]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Twenty-nine of the 1075 standard inertial navigation system sets, as fitted to the Harrier GR7, were converted to the 1075G standard at a total cost of approximately £600,000. There are no plans to convert any more sets to the 1075G standard.

Nuclear Tests (Nevada)

Mr. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he expects to receive information from his United States counterpart on the hydronuclear tests announced by the United States administration to be ordered at the Nevada test site in 1996. [1586]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I assume the hon. Member is referring to US plans to conduct hydrodynamic tests which do not involve any nuclear yield. There are long-standing arrangements allowing for the exchange of nuclear weapons—related information between the US and UK where the two parties believe that it would be mutually beneficial.

Defence Contractors

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the Royal Ordnance having an office in the procurement division of his Department and a stand with exhibits on permanent exhibition in his Department's main building; and if he will make a statement. [1047]

Mr. Arbuthnot: In certain circumstances, main defence contractors may be allocated office space within MoD buildings; any such requests are considered on their merits. Royal Ordnance has an office on the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency site at Fort Halstead, but it does not have an office within the procurement executive, and there are no plans to provide one.

There is no permanent exhibition of Royal Ordnance products within my Department's main building.

Written Questions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason parliamentary written questions 8851G, 8854G–56G, 8863G, 8869G, 8874G, 8876G, 8878G–8886G, 8888G–8889G; from the hon. Member for Don Valley were not published in the Official Report on 23 October as advised; on what date they will be published in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement. [404]

Mr. Soames: The written answers referred to by the hon. Member were given on 24 October and passed to the Official Report in the usual way but I am informed by the Editor that there is no record of them having been received. The answers were published as an addendum to the Official Report on 22 November 1995.

Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on recruitment to the TAVR. [471]

Mr. Soames: An active programme of recruitment is being undertaken to provide the annual intake necessary to meet the Territorial Army's establishment of 59,000 personnel. This programme includes national advertising campaigns on television and in the national press, and regional campaigns geared to local circumstances.

Army Technical Support Agency

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about Defence Agency status for the Army's technical branches and authorities. [2475]

Mr. Soames: The Army's technical branches and authorities—aircraft branch REME, electronics branch REME, vehicles and weapons branch REME, Army scaling and cataloguing authority and the land systems technical publications authority—were subject to an internal management study in 1993. The study concluded the Army's technical branches and authorities, which provide a range of technical support services for the Army and other services, would operate more effectively as a defence agency. In the period since the study a chief executive (designate) has been appointed and a detailed analysis of technical support business has been undertaken to determine how the agency would operate.

On 16 October 1995 I agreed to the formation of the Army Technical Support Agency as a defence agency from the former technical branches and authorities. ATSA will remain part of MOD but the chief executive will have delegated executive powers to discharge his responsibilities.

ATSA comprises a headquarters in Andover and currently occupies six main sites at Middle Wallop, Malvern, Chertsey, Woolwich—two sites and Chilwell. It employs some 1,250 staff, 900 of which are civil servants, with the balance being military. A major strategy within the ATSA initiative is to reduce the number of main sites and a study is now examining the options for collation. I will be making a further announcement in due course to advise the hon. Member of developments.

ATSA contributes to the operational capability of the armed forces by providing technical advice and services, which promote efficiency in equipment support and enhance availability and supportability in the design of front-line military equipment.

ATSA has been set demanding targets. These are largely based on satisfying the customer requirement, whether it be for MOD's integrated logistic support managers working in the procurement executive, equipment support managers or the field force. The targets for the first 18 months to March 1997 are:

Key target 1—Be effective in influencing the design of an equipment through its life.

By 31 March 1996 establish a baseline and develop the target to measure ATSA's effectiveness in influencing equipment design.

By 31 March 1997 meet the target set.

Key target 2—Produce effective scales of spare parts.

By 31 March 1996 develop a methodology to measure effectiveness of scales covering range, depth and cost.

By 31 March 1997 meet the target set.

Key target 3—Be responsive to ad hoc (help line) technical queries.

By 31 March 1996 achieve 80 per cent. of queries resolved on receipt or within 2 working days with the remaining 20 per cent. acknowledged with a plan on how the query will be resolved.

By 31 March 1997 achieve 82 per cent.

Key target 4—Be responsive to demands for technical publications (between receipt of a demand and despatch of a publication).

By 31 March 1996 achieve an average of 10 days.

By 31 March 1997 achieve an average of 9 days.

Key target 5—Deliver a timely ATSA technical project service.

By 31 March 1996 establish a baseline and develop the target to measure the timeliness of ATSA's work.

By 31 March 1997 meet the target set.

Key target 6—Deliver a timely ATSA service by reducing the administrative lead time (ALT) to complete initial spares provisioning lists.

By 31 March 1996 achieve an average ALT of 11 months.

By 31 March 1997 achieve an average ALT of 10 months.

Key target 7—Satisfy the customer when undertaking technical projects.

By 31 March 1996 establish a baseline and develop the target to measure customer satisfaction.

By 31 March 1997 meet the target set.

Key Target 8—Increase efficiency by managing additional commitments within a declining budget while maintaining the programme by volume with no degradation in the quality of the service.

Improve efficiency by 4 per cent. in 1996–97 over previous year.

All the targets will encourage continuous improvement in ATSA services or efficiency which will be achieved by rationalisation and by improving processes.

Additionally, milestone key targets will drive ATSA to achieve restructuring; competing the technical publications activity as part of the ATSA competing for quality programme; the development of business systems and collocation, of the land systems elements, on a single site by mid-1998.

Explosives, Propellants and Related End Products Agreement

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how the explosives, propellants and end products agreement applied to defence contracts with (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Jordan, (c) Oman and (d) Malaysia; and what was the financial benefit to Royal Ordnance of the relevant contracts with these countries; [992]

(2) what (a) was and (b) are the objectives and purposes of the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement; [1035]

(3) what has been Royal Ordnance's record under the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement in respect of (a) timeliness of delivery, (b) quality and (c) pricing; and if he will make a statement; [989]

(4) over what period the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement is applicable; [1037]

(5) what is the successor arrangement to the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement which expired in March 1993; [1029]

(6) what other companies, other than Royal Ordnance, were or are party to the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement; [1036]

(7) what plans he has to introduce competition for the supply of certain products under the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement; what factors have inhibited competition to date; and if he will make a statement; [990]

(8) what joint ventures with foreign companies have been considered, or entered into, under the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement; [991]

(9) if he will list the agreements made between Her Majesty's Government and British Aerospace Royal Ordnance prior to the signing of the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement; and if he will make a statement; [1034]

(10) what current orders and supply of products (a) did and (b) does the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement apply to; [1038]

(11) if he will list those aspects of the explosives, propellants and related end products agreement which expired in March 1993 which (a) remain commercial-in-confidence and (b) are no longer commercial-in-confidence; and if he will make a statement. [1030]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The explosives, propellants and related end products agreement had two main objectives: first, to secure the supply of the majority of the Ministry of Defence's ammunition requirements of the five-year period following the privatisation of the Royal Ordnance factories; and secondly, to guarantee a core work load for the newly established Royal Ordnance plc, allowing the company to develop into an efficient competitor.

The EPREP agreement subsumed two earlier agreements—the explosives and propellants agreement of August 1986 and the small arms agreement of September 1986.

The EPREP agreement ran from 1 April 1988 to 31 March 1993 and covered 42 different types of ammunition including tank, field gun, mortar, small arms and Navy ammunition. RO's performance under the agreement was satisfactory in terms of timely delivery, quality and price. Although all the work is now completed, the terms and conditions of the agreement remain "commercial-in-confidence" until both the signatories agree otherwise.

The only parties to the EPREP agreement were RO and the Ministry of Defence. No other companies were involved. The agreement was not concerned with exports.

All the orders placed under the agreement were awarded non-competitively. During the period of the agreement, the Ministry of Defence assessed and trialled alternative products from other suppliers so that, in the future, more ammunition orders could be subjected to competition.

There was no successor arrangement to the EPREP agreement. However, the success of the agreement in helping to make RO an efficient competitor was shown in 1993 when RO secured, largely in competition, a major long-term Ministry of Defence contract for ammunition. This contract covered much of the armed forces' requirement for small arms ammunition between 1993 and 2000 and for larger calibres between 1993 and 1998.

HMS Andromeda

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning his Department's ships (a) HMS Andromeda and (b) HMS Sirius. [1823]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Regarding the former HMS Andromeda, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 6 July 1995, Official Report, column 371. The former HMS Sirius has been decommissioned, and awaits disposal. We are considering a number of disposal options for her. No final decision has yet been made concerning her future sale, or use for other purposes.

Upholder Submarines

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total original cost of purchasing the four Upholder class submarines. [1822]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my predecessor gave him on 21 April 1995, Official Report, column 308.

Porton Down

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the titles of each of the unclassified technical papers known as Porton notes produced by the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment Porton Down between 1965 and 1968. [1583]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking if he will list the titles of the unclassified technical papers known as Porton Notes produced by the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down between 1965 and 1968 has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

I have listed below the titles of each of the unclassified technical papers known as Porton Notes produced by the Chemical Defence Experimental Establishment, a fore-runner of CBDE, between 1965 and 1968.

Porton Note-288—Preliminary studies on an anagram test for use in performance assessment.

Porton Note-374—Development of spray equipment. Hand-held training.

Porton Note-378—Ministry of Labour approval scheme for dust respirators. Report on the protector dust respirator Q/R2000.

Porton Note-393—HM factory inspectorate approval scheme for dust respirators. Report on the Safirmatic dust respirator.

Porton Note-376—Construction of a radio transmitter for the short range telemetry of cat electroencephalograms.

Porton Note-375—Report on the Martindale positive powered respirator unit.

Porton Note-373—Certification mark scheme for dust respirators. Report on the Protector dust respirator Q/R. 1000.

Porton Note-371—Ministry of Labour approval scheme for canister respirators. Report on the Baxter canisters.

Porton Note-368—Certification mark scheme for dust respirators. Report on the Baxter pneuseal dust respirator.

Porton Note-367—Polarographic estimation of enzyme activity.

Porton Note-359—Vapour source for the calibration of automatic alarms in the field.

Porton Note-358—Humidity control system for a small chamber.

Porton Note-353—Radio-controlled rotorod aerosol sampler.

Porton Note-349—Sodium flame test for respirator canisters.

Porton Note-347—Estimation of diffusion at short range in stable conditions.

Porton Note-346—Determination of quantitative values for various categories of vertical stability of the atmosphere.

Porton Note-343—Concept attainment test.

Porton Note-341—Improvements to the sodium flame penetrometer.

Porton Note-340—Electrical measurement of respiration and heart rate.

Porton Note-336—Blood cholinesterase levels and symptoms in anticholinesterase poisoning.

Porton Note-335—Use of polybutadiene synthetic rubber in respirator rubbers.

Porton Note-334—Dispenser for the CS pellet for use in testing the AFU Mk 2.

Porton Note-333—Certification mark scheme for dust respirators. Report on the British American optical companys Safline dust respirator.

Porton Note-332—Device for automatically aligning a particle sampler into the wind.

Porton Note-331—Review of recent research on aerosol filtration.

Porton Note-329—Removal of simulated particulate fallout from a vehicle using the Porton exhaust powered vacuum cleaner.

Porton Note-328—Normative data for a test battery used to assess human performance following drugs.

Porton Note-327—Comparison of the smoke performances of the British 81mm and 3 inch WP mortar bombs.

Porton Note-326—Report on the Martindale-fumex respirator.

Porton Note-325 Comparison between the sodium chloride and nitrogen meter respirator leakage tests.

Porton Note-323—Certification mark scheme for dust respirators. Report on the British American optical company's Sure-guard dust respirator.

Porton Note-321—Critical assessment of the claims made for toxogonin, An antidote for organophosphorus poisoning.

Porton Note-320—Some tests of the Mullard automatic particle analyser type L188.

Porton Note-319—Ministry of Labour approval scheme for canister respirators. Report on the Angus canister respirator.

Porton Note-319A—Ministry of Labour approval scheme for canister respirators. Gas tests of industrial containers for Geo. Angus and Company.

Porton Note-318—High Speed gas-liquid chromatography: Column evaluation.

Porton Note-317—Sampling efficiency of millipore filter sampler design CD 6895.

Porton Note-316—Correlation of filter penetrations by different particulate test clouds.

Porton Note-314—Regeneration of used charcoal from air purification filters.

Porton Note-313—Gaseous atmospheric pollutants. A literature survey.

Porton Note-311—Assessment of used charcoals from air purification units by heat of wetting measurements.

Porton Note-310—Spectroscopic studies on ricin. The quantitative determination of sodium sulphate content and an apparent correlation of infrared absorption with toxicity.

Porton Note-303—Swelling of rubber in vapour and liquid:-Literature and theory.

Porton Note-296—Certification mark scheme for duct respirators. Report on the MSA Comfo ideal dust respirator.

Porton Note-293—Effect of water on G and V agents. A review of work carried out in the UK.

Porton Note-289—Devices for the teaching of expired air resuscitation.

Porton Note-378—Ministry of Labour approval scheme for dust respirators: Report on the protector dust respirator Q/R 2000.

Porton Note-374—Development of spray equipment. Hand-held training.

Porton Note-388—Permeability characteristics of the skin: A literature survey.

Porton Note-392—Effect of water vapour on the responses of a micro-argon ionisation detector.

Porton Note-395—Vertical diffusivity profiles for diffusion to range 1Km.

Porton Note-394—HM factory inspectorate approval scheme for dust respirators: Report on the Martindale dust respirators types W and Y.

Porton Note-383—Ministry of Labour approval scheme for dust respirators report on the Pirelli dust respirators type BN9C1.

Porton Note-391—Estimate of the metabolic cost of decontamination for two teams of men using two different techniques.

Porton Note 385—Australian Finger Cherry, Rhodomyrtus Macrocarpa Benth. Toxicological study of some fruit extracts.

In my letter to you of the 26 July I said that 57 of the Porton Notes were unclassified. Whilst compiling this list it was discovered that the original Library listing contained duplicate entries for Porton Notes 383 and 393. This is why the above list only includes 55 titles. I am sorry about this.

I hope this information is helpful.

Sea Dumping Operations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all coastal or sea disposal sites used for the dumping of (a) surplus chemical weapons, (b) chemical weapons recovered from enemy forces, (c) surplus conventional explosives, (d) toxic wastes and (e) radioactive waste since 1965; and what quantity of the waste materials of each category is dumped at each site. [1581]

Mr. Soames: Complete records of MoD sea dumping operations undertaken are no longer available. Accordingly, it is not possible to identify the total tonnages or precise nature of defence-related materials or waste products disposed of by this means. Records show that sea dumping of chemical weapons ended in 1957. Beaufort's dyke was the Departments's main conventional munitions disposal site in the north channel, where over 1 million tonnes of munitions were dumped between 1945 and 1973. An emergency MoD disposal took place in 1976 involving two cases of heavily corroded 40mm shells. Hurd Deep, situated in the English channel some 50 miles south of Prawle Point near Plymouth was also a conventional weapon dump site but no complete record appears to have survived of dumping operations at this site after the immediate post-war period until its use was discontinued in 1973. Between 1973 and 1985, up to 2,000 tonnes of conventional munitions were disposed of annually at the deep water dump site situated approximately 400 miles south-west of Lands End, off the continental shelf. From 1985 until October 1992, when the sea dumping of munitions was terminated, the annual disposals were as follows: 904 tonnes; 1,882 tonnes, 1,565 tonnes; 3,244 tonnes; 1,544 tonnes; 1,775 tonnes; 1,093 tonnes and 8,764 tonnes. There are a number of other explosive dumping grounds charted in British waters but these were not routinely used. Details of the UK's sea disposal programme for low and intermediate level radioactive wastes, including wastes generated by MoD establishments, are contained in a report commissioned by the Department of the Environment, "Report of the Independent Review of Disposal of Radioactive Waste in the Northeast Atlantic", published in November 1984.

Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the climatic chamber in the human factors section at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down was built; and what this chamber is used for. [1562]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking when the climatic chamber in the Human Factors section at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment was built and what it is used for has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

This facility, which is used to assess the effects of wearing protective equipment on personnel in a variety of ambient temperatures and humidities, was built in the early 1950s.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down have been exposed to chemical warfare agents in experiments since 1965; what was the purpose of these experiments; when these experiments took place; and what were the conclusions of these experiments. [1560]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking how many staff at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment have been exposed to chemical warfare agents in experiments since 1965 has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

No members of staff have been exposed to chemical warfare agents as part of experiments since 1965.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many scientific and biological papers were published between 1969 and 1991 under the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment technical paper series; and how many of these papers are now unclassified. [1609]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking how many papers were published between 1969 and 1991 in the Chemical Defence Establishment Technical Paper series and how many of them are now unclassified has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

A total of 610 technical papers in the CDE Technical Series were published between 1969 and 1991. These reports are now held in a variety of places and it would involve disproportionate effort to check on the current security classification of all of them, bearing in mind that classification is reviewed from time to time. I can, however, tell you that of the total 610 technical papers, 193 were produced as unclassified documents.

I am sorry I cannot be more helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what experiments have been carried out in the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment's new facility for testing equipment and volunteers since the facility was opened in February 1994; and how many years this new facility is projected to be in service. [1563]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking what experiments have been conducted in the new facility opened in February 1994 at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

The new facility opened in February 1994 replaced the exposure chambers previously used to conduct studies involving equipment and service volunteers. To date the new facility has been used to carry out evaluations of collective and individual protection equipment and chemical agent detection systems. No studies involving service volunteers have taken place in this facility so far. The fitting and testing of respirators routinely issued to personnel at CBDE is also carried out in this facility. The lifetime of the facility is projected to be at least twenty years.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of section 6 No. 5 of the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment's range safety regulation issued in 1984 which relates to the use of exposure chambers. [1564]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking if copies of Section 6 No. 5 of the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment's Range of Safety Regulations issued in 1984 can be placed in the Library of the House of Commons has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

I have made arrangements for a copy of this section of the Range Safety Regulations to be placed in the Library. You should be aware however that the procedures set out in this section refer exclusively to the now disused exposure chambers and not to the facility opened in February 1994.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new buildings are planned to be built at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down, as part of its building replacement programme. [1610]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking what new buildings are planned to be built at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down as part of the building replacement plan has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

CBDE are currently undertaking an investment appraisal into the possibility and viability of replacing a number of the ageing buildings with more modern, cost effective structures. The scheme being considered provides for replacement buildings for the Medical Countermeasures, Detection, Protection and Hazard Assessment Sections together with their support facilities in a floor area considerably smaller than that presently occupied. The scheme has yet to receive permission to proceed to the design stage.

CBDE are about to award a design commission for a new Containment Building for work with microbiological organisms. If constructed this building will replace some of the old Microbiological building which will then be demolished. The scheme does not currently have permission to proceed beyond the design stage.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the conclusion of the research work at Nancekuke to investigate the storage of GB referred to in his answer of 16 March, Official Report, column 709; and when this work was carried out. [1616]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking what the conclusions of the research carried out at Nancekuke to investigate the storage of GB has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment as one of its divisions.

The work carried out at Nancekuke on the long term storage of the nerve gas GB took place from 1957 until the late 1970s and concluded that, suitably stabilised, the agent would have a shelf life in excess of twenty years.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when the Health and Safety Executive last conducted a safety inspection at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down; and when the next Health and Safety Executive inspection of the establishment is scheduled; [1561]

(2) if he will place in the Library copies of reports arising out of the Health and Safety Executive inspections of the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down, in 1983 and 1988. [1615]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Defence asking when the Health and Safety Executive last inspected the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, Porton Down and if copies of the reports of the inspections carried out in 1983 and 1988 can be placed in the Library of the House of Commons has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

The Health and Safety Executive last carried out a full safety inspection at CBDE in 1988. The next inspection is scheduled to take place early in 1996. Requests for placing copies of the reports of the Health and Safety Executive inspections in the House of Commons Library should be made to the Director General of the Health and Safety Executive.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the 21 safety audits referred to in his answer of 18 July, Official Report, columns 175–76 reviewed the arrangements for carrying out tests and studies in the service volunteer programme. [1611]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 23 November 1995:

Your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking if the safety audits referred to in the answer of 18 July, Official Report, column 175–6 reviewed the arrangements for carrying out tests and studies in the service volunteer programme has been passed to me to reply as the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency which includes CBDE as one of its divisions.

The safety audits referred to in the reply of 18th July were not concerned with the Service Volunteer programme. All protocols for conducting studies which involve the use of Service volunteers are reviewed by the Independent Ethics Committee.

I hope this information is helpful.

Damages Claim (Tornado Aircraft)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make progress in recovering compensation from Bricom Securum in relation to damage done by Airwork Ltd. to the F-3 Tornado squadron at RAF St Athans. [1326]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 21 November 1995]: My Department has presented the extent and nature of its claim to Bricom and is continuing to pursue it.

TREASURY

Economic and Monetary Union

3. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement concerning the progress of forecast expenditure towards the convergence targets set for economic and monetary union. [692]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is no convergence target for public expenditure which is a matter for national Governments to decide. I expect the United Kingdom to meet the convergence criteria and to be in a position to decide whether to participate in monetary union when the time comes.

Value Added Tax

17. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect VAT extension has had on the economy and on living standards. [708]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The extension of VAT to domestic fuel and power contributed to the Government's objective of controlling and reducing the PSBR. This is the best way to achieve sustainable growth in the economy and in living standards. There was a generous compensation package to compensate those hit hardest by the change.

18. Mr. Hall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the rate and scope of VAT. [709]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I cannot anticipate my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget statement.

21. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to extend the scope of VAT. [713]

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's taxation plans are announced in my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget speech and not before.

Budget

19. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received about the contents of his forthcoming Budget statement. [710]

Mr. Jack: My right hon. and learned Friend and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has as usual received a large number of Budget representations.

Social Chapter

20. Mr. Garel-Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from business leaders regarding the social chapter. [711]

Mr. Waldegrave: Business leaders have indicated that they consider employment legislation to be one of the most burdensome types of regulation in a recent Union of Industrial and Employers Confederations of Europe, UNICE, survey. A further survey last summer by the European Enterprise Centre showed that two thirds of Europe's smaller companies were worried that higher costs resulting from the social chapter would make them less competitive.

Gross National Product

22. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the relationship between the percentage of GNP taken up by public spending and economic performance. [714]

Mr. Waldegrave: Lower public spending, lower taxes and lower borrowing are essential to building a dynamic thriving economy which can compete in world markets.

Inheritance Tax

23. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to the Exchequer of the abolition of inheritance tax. [715]

Mr. Jack: I refer to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) on 1 November 1995, Official Report, column 259.

Disposable Income

24. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what areas and by which method the Government have ensured an increase in the disposable income of the average family since April 1992. [716]

Mr. Jack: The Government have consistently sought rising living standards through a combination of prudent monetary and fiscal policies and continuing supply-side reforms to boost the real productive capacity of the economy. Real personal disposable income has grown by over 6 per cent. since early 1992. Unemployment has fallen by over 700,000 since its peak at the end of 1992.

Investment

25. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on investment levels in the United Kingdom. [718]

Mr. Waldegrave: OECD figures show that United Kingdom investment has grown significantly faster than the EC average rate since 1980, having grown at less than the EC average rate in the 1960s and 1970s.

Mr. Cann: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the investment rates in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Japan (i) 1979 and (ii) the last year for which figures are available. [1628]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Information on investment is set out in the OECD publication "National Accounts", available in the House of Commons Library.

Betting Duty

26. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on the level of general betting duty. [719]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received many representations on the level of general betting duty. In addition I have met representatives of the British Horseracing Board, the Horserace Betting Levy Board, the Bookmaker's Committee, the British Greyhound Racing Board, the British Betting Office Association and the Betting Office Licensees Association over the last few weeks.

Public Expenditure

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what priority he gives to cutting public spending as a proportion of GDP. [701]

Mr. Waldegrave: It is a central part of the Government's economic strategy to reduce public spending as a share of national output below 40 per cent. This is essential to enable the private sector to generate the jobs, investment and wealth that make our economy prosperous and competitive in world markets.

Income Tax

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income tax was raised in the financial year 1994–95; and what percentage came from the present top rate. [127]

Mr. Jack: It is estimated that the total income tax liability after tax credits in 1994–95 is £66.9 billion, of which about 9 per cent. is the liability in excess of the basic rate.

Consultants

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the information contained in his answer of 7 February 1991, Official Report, column 204, in respect of the issues and departments for which (a) Herbert Smith and Associates, (b) Slaughter and May and Kleinwort Benson have been used by the Government. [1095]

Mr. Jack: The tables have been updated to show the issues, sponsoring departments and in which positions the firms of Herbert Smith and Associates, Slaughter and May and Kleinwort Benson were appointed since 1983.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government which have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [44]

Mr. Jack: Sections 33, 42 and 96(4) of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 cover local authorities. This Act consolidated existing legislation and therefore did not change the content of the law. The provisions of Finance Acts giving legislative effect to the Budget affect local government in common with other bodies and individuals.

Taxation

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the new reliefs from offers against, and exclusion from, inheritance tax and capital gains tax that he has announced since April 1992, in each case indicating the expected number of beneficiaries in a full year and the cost of the relief. [85]

Mr. Jack: There have been no new reliefs from inheritance tax since the answer to a similar question from the hon. Member for Newcastle on Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) on 25 November 1994, Official Report, column 466. However, there have been changes/extensions to the inheritance tax threshold and relief for agricultural assets.

The new reliefs from capital gains tax announced since April 1992:

Reinvestment relief (excluding deferral reliefs under venture capital trusts and the Enterprise Investment Scheme);

Venture Capital Trusts;

Enterprise Investment Scheme.

Unfortunately it is not possible to provide a reliable estimate for the number of beneficiaries in a full year. However, estimates for the full-year costs in 1995–96 of the new reliefs are:

Million

	Cost[1]
Reinvestment relief	50
Venture Capital Trusts	10
Enterprise Investment Scheme	10

[1] These estimates are tentative and subject to a wide margin of error.

There have also been changes/extensions to CGT retirement and rollover reliefs and to the CGT annual exemption.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Transport buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [378]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have not used London Transport buses or London Underground while on official business in the last year.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1441]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Figures showing progress between 1990–91 and 1993–94 towards cutting energy consumption in Government departments responsible to the Chancellor of the Exchequer were given by the Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency on 17 May, Official Report, column 259–60. Data for 1994–95 are not yet available.

Housing Investment Trusts

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if housing investment trusts will be permitted to take over existing rented properties. [1416]

Mr. Jack: It would not be appropriate for me to comment on tax matters at this stage of the Budget cycle.

Unemployment

Mr. Dobson To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many families contain two or more unemployed people at the latest date for which figures are available [1485]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 21 November 1995]: Estimates from the winter—December 1994 to February 1995—Labour Force Survey show that of 25.4 million families in Great Britain 170,000 families contained two or more ILO unemployed people.

WALES

Temazepam

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what amount of temazepam per capita is distributed annually in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [1507]

Mr. Richards: In 1994, 109 grams of temazepam were dispensed on prescription per 1,000 population in Wales. The figures for the first quarter of 1995–96 show a marked decrease in the prescribing of the soft gel capsule formulations as a result of a voluntary ban by many general practitioners.

Breast Cancer Services

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the breast cancer services available, and what they comprise for each area. [1145]

Mr. Richards: The national breast screening programme, which undertakes routine screening and assessment for women aged 50 to 64 years, is provided on an all-Wales basis by Breast Test Wales. The availability of symptomatic breast caner services, including treatment, is the responsibility of district health authorities and general practitioners and is reflected in contracts with NHS trusts.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many planning appeals to his office have been accepted or rejected in each of the last 10 years. [1157]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is contained in the "Digest of Welsh Statistics", published annually. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Inward Investment

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the value, at current prices, of inward investment to Wales in the last five years. [1400]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The forecast capital investment by inward investment projects into Wales from overseas and elsewhere in the United Kingdom over the last five years has been £585 million in 1990–91; £1.1 billion in 1991–92; £949 million in 1992–93; £765 million in 1993–94; and £921 million in 1994–95. These figures are based upon information provided by companies at the time of the decision to invest and take no account of any subsequent decisions.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility. [1450]

Mr. Hague: At the end of 1993–94, the latest year for which figures are available, energy consumption in my Department was 2 per cent. lower than it was in 1990–91, the base year of the Government's energy efficiency campaign. Within this figure a 21 per cent. cut in the use of fossil fuels was achieved. Carbon dioxide emissions were reduced by 26 per cent.

The Welsh Office has continued to increase its efficiency in energy usage and I anticipate that the 1994–95 figures will show further improvement overall.

Suicides

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each district council area, county council area and for Wales as a whole the number of suicides recorded; and if he will express this number as a percentage of the overall population for (a) 1971, (b) 1981, (c) 1991 and (d) for each of the last available three years for which figures are available. [1081]

Mr. Richards: In view of the large number of figures requested I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Detention of Persons

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all those hospitals used in Wales for the detention of persons under the Mental Health Acts; and which of those are private hospitals. [1595]

Mr. Hague: The following hospitals can be used for the detention of persons under the Mental Health Act:

NHS hospitals and units

Bodfaen Mental Illness Unit
Bodnant Unit and EMI, Llandudno Hospital
Brecon War Memorial Hospital
Broddyfi Community Hospital

Mental Health

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were detained in Wales during each of the last three years under the provisions of the Mental Health Acts; and what percentage of these were held in private hospitals. [1596]

Mr. Hague: The information is as follows:

Admissions to hospitals and nursing homes of people detained under provisions of the Mental Health Act, 1983, or other acts

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
NHS hospitals	1,208	1,055	1,251
Private hospitals	28	80	124
Private nursing homes	6	1	5
Total	1,242	1,136	1,380
Percentage detained in private hospitals	2	7	9

Dental Practitioners

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent by each family health service authority on payments to dental practitioners for NHS dental work in each year between 1990 and 1994, inclusive in Wales. [2060]

Mr. Richards: The information requested is as follows:

FHSA	1990–91	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
Clwyd	5,235	(424)	64	71	75
Dyfed	4,735	(373)	99	165	142
Gwent	6,667	(617)	127	148	122
Gwynedd	3,032	(252)	26	101	116
Mid Glamorgan	6,671	(655)	69	57	72
Powys	1,456	(127)	62	33	116
South Glamorgan	6,558	(597)	53	68	81
West Glamorgan	6,049	(565)	29	21	19
Dental Practice Board	—	55,564	51,282	48,445	50,123
Wales	40,403	51,954	51,811	49,109	50,866

Notes:

1. Dental Practice Board (DPB) expenditure is shown to give the complete picture of payments to dental practitioners.

2. With effect from 1 April 1991 the majority of payments to dental practitioners became the responsibility of the DPB. However, due to the timetable of scheduling by the DPB, March 1991 schedules were paid in April 1991 by FHSAs. The balance of their opening creditors were met by payments made by the DPB and were recorded by FHSAs as negative expenditure. At national level the aggregate amount (FHSA and DPB consolidated together) reflects actual expenditure which is comparable with the aggregated outturns for other years.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will make a statement on the main aims of the reforms he proposes to the membership of the community health councils. [1728]

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of the consultation document on amending the membership size and qualification of Welsh community health councils. [1729]

Mr. Hague: In the light of increasing difficulties in maintaining the current membership levels of community health councils, and the reduction in the number of local councillors from next April, I believe that it is appropriate to seek views from a wide range of bodies on the total membership of community health councils in Wales.

The review in no way challenges the special status of community health councils in representing the public and patient interest in relation to the NHS in Wales.

I have arranged for copies of the consultation letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if the current 21-hour rule enabling unemployed people to study while receiving benefit will be reduced to 16 guided learning hours when the jobseeker's allowance is introduced in Wales; what distinction will be made in respect of the treatment of unemployed people who take up places in (a) further and (b) higher education courses; and if he will make a statement. [1138]

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

Full-time students will not be able to receive jobseeker's allowance. People receiving JSA will, however, will be able to study part time, as long as they meet the entitlement conditions, which include being available for actively seeking employment. This carries forward existing arrangements.

In higher education, courses continue to be classed as either full-time or part-time and so the existing rules distinguishing between people on such courses can—and consequently will—be carried forward into JSA. In further education, however, courses are no longer defined as full-time or part-time, and the rules under JSA will reflect this. Courses funded, in whole or in part, by the Further Education Funding Councils for Wales and England will be considered to be part-time if they are of no more than 16 guided learning hours per week. While those courses in Wales are not, as they are in England, defined by the number of guided learning hours, further education colleges in Wales will nevertheless be able to provide statements of the number of guided learning hours attributed to their courses using the same definition.

These rules are designed to allow the same number of people to study part time while unemployed and receiving benefit as do so under the current rules.

Training for Work

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each training and enterprise council in Wales the number of training for work starts for (a) 1993–94 and (b) 1994–95; what is the estimated number in 1995–96; and what is the total budget for training for work in each TEC for the same years. [1927]

Mr. Richards: The information requested is set out in the following tables: Outturn figures are given for 1993–94 and 1994–95 and planned provision for 1995–96.

Training for Work

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96[1]

Allied Medical Services

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received in relation to the registration of Allied Medical Services as an agency for temporary nursing staff with respect to vetting procedures in respect of the hiring out of auxiliary nurses. [1731]

Mr. Hague: None. The licensing of nursing agencies is the responsibility of local authorities.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

BBC

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions her Department has had with the British Broadcasting Corporation in relation to the delays in completing NICAM coverage of their broadcast network. [1712]

Mr. Sproat: None. It is for the BBC to determine the rate at which this programme proceeds in the light of its resources and other engineering priorities. However, I understand that the BBC remains committed to an extension of NICAM coverage as part of its continuing programme of investment in its transmitter network.

Tourism

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which of the four options, I, II, III or IV, outlined in the European Commission's Green Paper on Tourism were supported by (a) the British Tourist Authority, (b) the Welsh tourist board, (c) the Northern Ireland tourist board, (d) the Scottish tourist board, (e) the Confederation of British Industry, (f) the National Trust, (g) the British Resorts Association, (h) the Association of District Councils and (i) the Rank Holiday Organisation. [1475]

Mr. Sproat: The tourist boards indicated the following preferred options:

British Tourist Authority/English Tourist Board jointly—Option III

Welsh Tourist Board—Option III

Northern Ireland Tourist Board—No preferred option specified; option III most appealing

Scottish Tourist Board—Option III

Of the other organisations to which the question refers, copies of responses were received from two, and they indicated support for the options indicated below:

Confederation of British Industry—Option III

British Resorts Associations—Option IV

Most of these organisations indicated that they wanted a higher profile for the tourist industry in Europe, but did not want more regulation.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list all the organisations which were consulted by her Department before the Government published their official response to the European Commission Green Paper on Tourism. [1476]

Mr. Sproat: In considering the Government's response to the Green Paper, my Department sought the views of the following organisations:

Association of British Travel Agents
Association of Leading Visitor Attractions
Association of Recognised English Language Services
British Holiday and Home Parks Association
British Hospitality Association
British Incoming Tour Operators Association
British Resorts Association
British Retail Consortium
British Tourist Authority
Confederation of British Industry
European Tour Operators Association
Hotel and Catering International Management Association
Hotel and Catering Training Company
Joint Hospitality Industry Congress
Restaurateurs Association of Great Britain
World Travel and Tourism Council

Copies of responses or comments were also received from the Automobile Association, the Council for the Protection of Rural England, the Federation of Small Businesses, the National Council of Hotels Associations, the Royal Automobile Club and the World Tourism Organisation.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, for Scotland and for Wales also consulted a number of organisations, as did the British Tourist Authority and English tourist board.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what alternative courses of action from those detailed in "Tourism: Competing with the Best" were considered in any environmental appraisal undertaken by his Department; [254]

(2) what procedures have been put in place by her Department to monitor the environmental impacts arising from the implementation of "Tourism: Competing with the Best"; [255]

(3) if "Tourism: Competing with the Best" was (a) subject to and (b) modified on account of an environmental appraisal using the guidance contained in "Policy Appraisal and the Environment" produced by the Department of the Environment; and if she will publish the appraisal. [253]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 22 November 1995]: In developing tourism policy the Government have been guided by the main conclusion of the tourism and environment task force, namely, that serious environmental problems caused by tourism are limited to a few locations at specific times. The task force also stated that many of these problems could be resolved through improved management; the Government responded by funding guidance publications and pilot projects. The recent report of the Environment Select Committee on the environmental impact of leisure activities agreed with the task force, finding no evidence that tourism and leisure pose a serious, immediate or intrinsic threat to the environment.

"Competing with the Best" sets out a number of measures to help the industry become more competitive, and is part of the Government's overall competitiveness programme. Its aim is not to deliver specific developments with measurable environmental impacts, but to equip the industry to deal with ever-increasing competition in the world marketplace. As "Competing with the Best" states, the Government recognise that tourism growth can be sustainable only if a balance is maintained between the needs of visitors and the needs of visitors and the needs of the environment.

Construction Industry

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions she has had with the Department of the Environment regarding the need for the implementation of the Latham report with particular reference to the British Library contract. [411]

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not considered it necessary to hold discussions with the Department of the Environment regarding the need for the implementation of the Latham report, following the experience of the British Library construction project.

However, the review by Sir Peter Levene's efficiency unit on Government procurement, which complements the Latham report, did consult the Department and drew upon the experiences of the British Library construction project in formulating its recommendations.

Sports Council

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many redundancies are forecast through the restructuring of the Great Britain Sports Council; and what estimate she has made as to the effects these are likely to have in the level and quality of service. [1607]

Mr. Sproat: Staff selection is in progress for the new organisations following the restructuring of the Great Britain Sports Council. Until posts within the new structures have been filled, it is not possible to give accurate numbers of staff whose employment will terminate on the grounds of compulsory or voluntary redundancy.

The restructuring I announced in July 1994 will enhance the service provided by the Sports Council. The new United Kingdom and English Sports Councils will have a sharper focus and reduced bureaucracy, which will greatly benefit sport.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the Acts of Parliament including Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by her Department since January 1994. [28]

Mr. Sproat: My Department has not introduced any Acts affecting local government during this period.

Culture Council

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, if she will make a statement on the outcome of the Culture Council held on 20 November. [2471]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Council of the European Union on Audiovisual and Culture matters met formally on 20 November; the UK was represented by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Lord Inglewood.

Agreement was reached between member states on the central elements of an amended version of the television without frontiers directive 1989. In particular, there was agreement satisfactory to the UK that there should be no strengthening of the current articles 4 and 5 on quotas and that a contact committee should be established along with a review after five years. Agreement was also secured on amendments to offer strengthened protection to minors and to clarify jurisdiction.

The Council confirmed its agreement to the MEDIA II training decision having taken into account the European Parliament's second reading amendments. Taken with the previous decision on the development and distribution elements of the MEDIA II programme, this will enable this five-year programme of support for the audiovisual industry to begin in 1996.

The Commission made a brief presentation on a proposed European audiovisual investment guarantee fund to promote cinema and television production.

The Council also discussed a draft common position on a proposal to establish the Raphael programme for European cultural heritage, but was unable to agree due to budgetary concerns. However, the Council was able to agree unanimously to adopt a resolution to encourage work on the promotion of statistics on culture and economic growth. The Council also heard a presentation from the Commission on the cross-border aspects of fixed book pricing systems.

It was agreed that the title of European City of Culture in the year 2000 should be shared by Avignon, Bologna, Prague, Cracow, Reykjavik, Brussels, Bergen, Santiago de Compostela and Helsinki. It was also decided that Valletta and Linz, both candidates to host the European Cultural Month in 1998, would be invited to share the title.

Sporting Events (Broadcasting)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if her Department has reviewed the sporting events listed under section 182 of the Broadcasting Act 1990. [1656]

Mr. Sproat: The list of sporting events drawn up under section 182 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 is kept under regular review.

Adult Television

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the outcome of the case before the European Court of Justice between Her Majesty's Government and the broadcaster Red Hot television. [167]

Mr. Sproat: The case has not yet been concluded.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which encryption systems have been employed by the television services Rendez Vous and TV Erotica and notified to the Secretary of State by the Independent Television Commission; and what powers she has to ban these systems. [166]

Mr. Sproat: I understand that both the TV Erotica and Rendez Vous channels employ the Eurocrypt encryption system for their broadcasts. An encryption system may be utilised by a number of different channels including, as in this case, by some whose broadcasts are in no way unacceptable. To outlaw an encryption system would not therefore be appropriate.

The order that I made on 14 November 1995 under section 177 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 proscribing TV Erotica, however, makes it a criminal offence to advertise, promote or sell the specific software, or smart cards, required to decode the TV Erotica channel's signal. The order comes into force on 5 December 1995. I am considering what action to take in the case of Rendez Vous.

Broadcasting

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, if she will make a statement on the EC's proposal to amend the television without frontiers directive in respect of the designating factor in determining which member state has jurisdiction. [164]

Mr. Sproat: The Government welcome the proposal that a revised television without frontiers directive should properly clarify and define the jurisdiction of member states over broadcasters. If, as proposed, establishment of the broadcasting company within a member state is to be the primary test of jurisdiction, it is imperative that a clear definition of establishment, for the purposes of the directive, should be incorporated in an amended text.

Departmental Staffing

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many staff her Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region; what is the cost of running these regional operations; what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [264]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 22 November 1995]: My Department is based in central London and has no other regional offices. The Department employs 363 staff and its running costs for the current financial year are £17,710 million. A breakdown of the main areas of expenditure can be found in the Department's 1994 annual report (Cm 2511) held in the Library of the House.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which she has responsibility in each year since 1994. [1436]

Mr. Sproat: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency, Official Report, columns 260–62.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Abdul Onibiyo

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what information he has concerning the safety of Abdul Onibiyo since he was removed to Nigeria; [1619]

(2) what representations he has received concerning the proposed removal of the Onibiyo family to Nigeria; and if he will make a statement. [1621]

Mr. Kirkhope: We have no information about Mr. Onibiyo's current situation. As I said in my reply to the hon. Member on 7 November Official Report, column 813, his claim to a well-founded fear of persecution in Nigeria was fully considered and rejected. That decision was upheld by the independent appellate authority.

In addition to representations made by the hon. Member for Islington, North, representations have been received from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and from the hon. Members for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey), for Rochdale (Ms Lynne), for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay), for Coventry, North-West, (Mr. Robinson), for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope), for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva), for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen), the Bishop of Southwark, the Churches Commission for Racial Justice, the Lambeth branch of Unison, other members of Unison and legal representatives acting for the Onibiyo family. In addition, early-day motions have been signed by the hon. Member for Islington, North and by the hon. Members for Newham, North-west (Mr. Banks), for Nottingham, South (Mr. Allen) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Removal Orders

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people (a) have been removed to Nigeria (i) before and (ii) after 10 November and (b) are currently the subject of removal orders. [1622]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is not available centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the available information shows that in the 12 months prior to 10 November 1995, 339 Nigerian nationals were either removed from the United Kingdom as illegal entrants or deported and that one has been removed since that date.

Stop-and-search Powers

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the number of people of African descent who are stopped, questioned and searched coming through British ports relative to the average number of people so detained. [1232]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is not available.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's current practice in respect of immigration officials passing on details of the claims of persons seeking asylum to the embassies of countries from which asylum seekers have travelled; and if he will make a statement. [1526]

Mr. Kirkhope: All applications for asylum in the United Kingdom are treated as confidential. No information about an asylum claim is disclosed to the authorities of the applicant's country of origin. However, both the Dublin convention, which is not yet in force, and the European Union resolution on minimum guarantees for asylum procedures provide for information to be disclosed in confidence to the asylum authorities of other member states of the European Union through which the applicant has passed or which may have responsibility for considering the asylum claim.

Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum have been rejected on the safe third country ground. [1260]

Mr. Kirkhope: In 1994 865 asylum applications were refused on the safe third country ground and 1,205 in the first nine months of 1995. A nationality split is available in table 4.3 of the Home Office statistical bulletin, "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", issue 15/95. A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the pilot scheme adopted by immigration officials to accelerate asylum applications from certain countries. [149]

Mr. Kirkhope: I am placing a short report on the pilot scheme in the Library.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which countries have undergone events likely to give rise to a well-founded fear of persecution among the nationals since 1988; and which countries are currently undergoing such events. [552]

Mr. Kirkhope: Under proposals on which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has been consulting for restricting the benefit entitlement of asylum seekers, it is envisaged that the Benefit Agency will be notified in the event of a future fundamental change of circumstances in a country such that persons will not normally be returned to it for the time being.

Probation Services

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of (a) probation officers and (b) probation assistants in post in each of the probation services in England and Wales in (i) 1979, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1990, (iv) 1991, (v) 1992, (vi) 1993 (vii) 1994. [2059]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information is given in the table. Figures for probation services' officers (ancillaries) are not available by individual area for 1979.

Political Asylum Applications

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum have been received from people previously resident in (a) Nigeria, (b) Turkey, (c) Iraq, (d) Iran and (e) China in each of the last five years; and how many of those applications, in each case, have been accepted. [1926]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information on asylum applications and grants of asylum from nationals of Nigeria, Turkey, Iraq, Iran and China are given in tables 2.1 and 3.1 respectively of the Home Office statistical bulletin, "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994, issue 15/95. A copy of this publication is available in the Library. It should be noted that grants of asylum in a particular year do not necessarily relate to applications made in that year.

Carl Bridgewater

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make an announcement about a referral of the case of the men convicted of the murder of Carl Bridgewater back to the Court of Appeal. [2011]

Mr. Kirkhope: We are very close to completing our consideration of this case.

Migration (Former Yugoslavia)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many visas he has earmarked for sick or injured children from the former Yugoslavia to be treated in the United Kingdom (a) in total and (b) by special arrangement with the International Organisation for Migration and the Child Advocacy International charity; [1726]

(2) what arrangements he has made for the provision of special visas earmarked for sick and injured children from the former Yugoslavia to be admitted by arrangement with Child Advocacy International and the International Organisation for Migration for medical treatment in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [1727]

Mr. Kirkhope: The United Kingdom has already admitted, under arrangements made by the International Organisation for Migration, 86 people from the former Yugoslavia under the Government's official medical evacuation programme, 28 of whom were under the age of 18. Of the 20 additional medical places announced in September, 14 remain to be filled.

The arrangements between IOM and Child Advocacy International are for the evacuation of Bosnian children for private medical treatment outside the official programme. These children will therefore need to meet the requirements of the immigration rules relating to private medical treatment.

Deportation Procedures

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to alter the present rule under which persons served with notice of deportation are free to take up paid employment in Britain. [1172]

Miss Widdecombe: We intend to take appropriate measures in the forthcoming Asylum and Immigration Bill.

Next Steps Agencies

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about executive agency status for the police scientific development branch. [2713]

Mr. Maclean: We have decided that the police scientific development branch should be considered as a candidate for executive agency status under the next steps initiative. A prior options study will be undertaken to establish whether agency status or some other option is the most appropriate. I would welcome comments from interested parties. Comments should be sent by 2 February 1996 to:

The Assistant Under Secretary of State

Police Complaints Authority

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made to appoint a successor to Sir Leonard Peach as chairman of the Police Complaints Authority. [2712]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Peter Moorhouse has agreed to be acting chairman of the Police Complaints Authority from Sir Leonard Peach's departure to take up the post of Commissioner for Public Appointments on 18 December. Mr. Moorhouse is currently senior deputy chairman of the authority. A substantive appointment will be made through open competition.

Performance-enhancing Drugs

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government has to outlaw the use of anabolic steroids and other performance enhancing drugs. [1473]

Mr. Maclean: The Government announced in November 1994, in line with a recommendation from the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs, its intention to bring anabolic steroids and other similar drugs under the controls of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

Since then, the Government have been taking careful and detailed technical advice from the advisory council on precisely which substances should be controlled. It is planned to lay the necessary draft modification order before Parliament soon.

Ticket Touts (Football Matches)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many criminal proceedings involving ticket tout offences at football matches contained in section 166 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 have been pursued to date; how many convictions were secured; and what plans his Department has for tightening the current legislation; [1471]

(2) how many criminal proceedings involving alleged offences contained in sections II, III and IV of the Football (Offences) Act 1991 were pursued in 1994; and how many convictions were secured. [1472]

Mr. Maclean: Information under the Football (Offences) Act 1991 is given in the table.

Information on cautioning and court proceedings data under section 166 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 will not be available until autumn 1996.

Persons prosecuted at magistrates' courts and convicted at all courts or cautioned for offences under The Football (Offences) Act 1991 England and Wales 1994

Prison Service (Study)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who is conducting the study of the relationship between the Prison Service and the Home Office; if he will list their qualifications for carrying out the study; what is the cost of the study; and when he expects to report the findings of the study. [384]

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. and learned Friend told the House on 16 October that work was under way in response to General Sir John Learmont's recommendation that this should be an in-depth study of the relationship between the Prison Service and the Home Office. The initial work has been assisted by Miss Kate Jenkins, who was one of the three authors of the 1988 efficiency unit report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, "Improving Management in Government: The Next Steps", which recommended the establishment of executive agencies. My right hon. and learned Friend has given an undertaking to report to the House when the work is complete. Information on the costs of individual contracts with consultants is commercial in confidence and it is not our practice to disclose these details.

Miss Elaine Connolly

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what considerations led to the transfer of Miss Elaine Connolly from Styal prison to Holloway prison; [140]

(2) what considerations led to the refusal to transfer Miss Elaine Connolly from Holloway prison to Styal prison. [141]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about Miss Elaine Connolly.

Miss Connolly was transferred from Styal prison to Holloway because information was received suggesting that she was planning to escape. On the basis of the information available to him, the governor considered that Miss Connolly should be transferred to more secure conditions.

Miss Connolly was then told she would be returned to Styal. This advice was given to her in error as a result of a failure in communication between staff at Holloway. I am sorry for this error and for raising Miss Connolly's hopes of returning to a prison nearer her home.

Refugees Convention

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those countries where circumstances which in the past have justified recourse to the 1951 UN convention on refugees have in the past 12 months ceased to exist. [554]

Mr. Kirkhope: All applications for asylum are considered in accordance with the criteria set out in the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees. Decisions are based on all the relevant circumstances of individual cases as well as on an assessment of conditions in the country of origin. There is no question of our refusing to consider, or of our automatically refusing, an application because of the country of origin of the applicant.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those countries that are not generating refugees as defined by the 1951 UN convention on refugees at the present time. [553]

Mr. Kirkhope: Information about asylum decisions, broken down by the country of origin of applicants, is contained in table 3 and 4 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1994", a copy of which is in the Library.

Prisoners (Escapes)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have escaped whilst being transported to and from court appearances and hospital visits since 1990; and how many remain uncaptured. [165]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about how many prisoners have escaped while being transported to and from court appearances and hospital visits since 1990 and how many remain uncaptured.

The information is given in the table below:

	Number
Crown Courts	50
Magistrates Courts	137
Hospital visits—outpatients	34
Hospital visits—inpatients	188

The information covers the period 1 January 1990 to 31 October 1995.

Prison Service records show that 26 of the escapers from court appearances and hospital visits remain uncaptured.

Prisons (VAT Payments)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much value added tax has been paid in addition to the published contract prices to the companies running (a) HMP Wolds, (b) HMP Blakenhurst, (c) HMP Doncaster and (d) HMP Buckley Hall for each financial year since the prisons opened; [388]

(2) how much value added tax has been recovered from the companies running: (a) HMP Wolds, (b) HMP Blakenhurst, (c) HMP Doncaster and (d) HMP Buckley Hall for each financial year since the prisons opened. [476]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about how much value-added tax has been paid in addition to the published contract prices to the companies running (a) HMP Wolds, (b) HMP Blakenhurst, (c) HMP Doncaster and (d) HMP Buckley Hall for each financial year since the prisons opened and how much has been recovered over the same period.

The Prison Service reclaims all VAT paid in respect of these contracts normally at the end of the subsequent quarter. The figures for the four contracted-out prisons are as follows:

Establishment and year	VAT paid (£)	VAT reclaimed (£)
HMP Wolds
1991–92	311,582	134,550
1992–93	862,872	788,658
1993–94	994,827	932,949
1994–95	1,254,501	1,183,715
1995–96	556,983	617,627
HMP Blakenhurst
1992–93	463,876	115,969
1993–94	1,499,327	1,400,602
1994–95	1,933,333	1,790,378
1995–96	732,443	1,029,053
HMP Doncaster
1993–94	254,475	0
1994–95	2,038,796	1,679,315
1995–96	966,712	1,137,398
HMP Buckley Hall
1994–95	294,657	145,250
1995–96	717,499	149,407

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the application and collection of value added tax affects the budgets and accounting procedures of (a) Prison Service managed prisons and (b) privately managed prisons; and if he will make a statement. [389]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how the application and collection of value-added tax affects the budgets and accounting procedures of (a) Prison Service managed prisons and (b) privately managed prisons.

Directly managed prisons pay and can reclaim VAT on a wide range of the services they purchase. Sums included in the supply estimate are appropriated-in-aid towards expenditure under the Vote. Prison Service payments to companies running privately managed prisons include VAT, which is subsequently reclaimed. The Prison Service is not involved in VAT payments by those companies for services they purchase.

Sentencing Guidelines

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the guidelines governing sentencing for trafficking in class B drugs. [136]

Mr. Maclean: The Government do not issue guidance on sentencing. The Magistrates Association issues sentencing guidelines for its members, which are available in the Library, and guidance is provided by Court of Appeal judgments in individual cases.

Ms Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the sentencing guidelines for conspiracy to supply cannabis. [133]

Mr. Maclean: The Government do not issue guidance on sentencing. The Magistrates Association issues sentencing guidelines for its members, which are available in the Library, and guidance is provided by Court of Appeal judgments in individual cases.

Parkhurst Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to decommission Her Majesty's Prison Parkhurst's category A status. [478]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the plans that are in place to decommission Parkhurst prison's category A status.

The Home Secretary announced on 16 October 1995 that Parkhurst prison was to be removed from the dispersal estate. The Director of Operations with responsibility for Parkhurst has set up a steering group, headed by the area manager, to manage the process of downgrading Parkhurst prison. The prison service will announce its detailed plans for this process shortly.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much has been spent to date on improving security at Her Majesty's Prison Parkhurst since the escape of three prisoners on 3 January; and how much of this sum is due to additional costs caused by implementing recommendations of the Learmont inquiry. [391]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how much has been spent to date on improving security at Parkhurst prison since the escape of three prisoners on 3 January 1995 and how much of this sum is due to additional costs caused by implementing recommendations of the Learmont inquiry.

Since the escape on 3 January, perimeter closed circuit television and alarm systems have been installed and modifications made to the emergency control room at a cost of £1.2 million.

Following publication of the Learmont inquiry the Home Secretary announced on 16 October that Parkhurst was to be removed from the dispersal estate. As a result of this announcement further security upgrading work at Parkhurst has been cancelled including two projects which had been let, for which expenditure of £300,000 has been incurred.

Legal Aid

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total sum expended on providing legal advice assistance and representation under the Immigration and Asylum Act 1993 in each year for which figures are available. [204]

Mr. Kirkhope: The grant paid under section 23 of the Immigration Act 1971 for each year since 1993–94 was as follows:

Refugee Legal Centre

1993–94: £1,890,000
1994–95: £3,000,000
1995–96: £3,100,000

Immigration Advisory Service

1993–94: £2,640,000
1994–95: £2,420,000
1995–96: £2,590,000

These figures do not include expenditure through green form legal aid.

Prison Education

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what mechanisms exist for (a) part-time and (b) full-time teaching staff (i) to promote new educational services for prisoners and (ii) to propose improvements in prison education. [398]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about what mechanisms exist for (a) part-time and (b) full-time teaching staff (i) to promote new educational services for prisoners and (ii) to propose improvements in prison education.

In accordance with paragraph 5.3 of the General Terms and Conditions of Contract covering the delivery of education services, the contractor is required to keep the specifications for courses, curriculum and the overall programme of courses at each establishment under continuous review. The way in which full-time and part-time teaching staff can be involved in this process is best determined and managed by the education contractor. Each governor is responsible for determining which courses will run at the establishment concerned and does this by placing orders with the education provider. The governor may obtain advice from an education and training adviser. If the governor agrees to a proposal from the education provider to change the education programme, an amendment to the orders will be issued. Proposals will usually be made known to the governor by the contractor's on-site representative, the education co-ordinator.

In 1994 the Prison Service awarded a contract to the National Prison Education Consortium to undertake a consultancy to develop a national curriculum framework for prison education. The Consortium consulted widely within and outside the Prison Service, and representatives of the education providers were involved in this process. The final report and recommendations of the consultancy have been accepted by the Prisons Board and disseminated to governors, education providers and chief librarians of public library authorities providing a service to prisons.

The steering committee which has been established to oversee implementation includes representatives of education contractors.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what safeguards exist to ensure that part-time Prison Service teaching staff have qualifications of the same calibre as full-time teaching Prison Service staff. [396]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about what safeguards exist to ensure that part-time Prison Service teaching staff have qualifications of the same calibre as full-time teaching Prison Service staff.

The teaching qualifications required of education contractors' staff teaching in prisons depend upon the nature of the subject and the level to which it is taught rather than the employment status of the teacher. In accordance with paragraph 7.1 of the General Terms and Conditions of Contract covering education services, contractors are responsible for recruiting teaching staff who hold qualifications consistent with those held by staff teaching equivalent subjects at colleges of further education or institutes of adult education. Paragraph 7.2 of the General Terms and Conditions of Contract enables a representative of the Prison Service to attend recruitment panels for teachers whom a contractor wishes to use at a prison establishment. Paragraph 7.4 of the General Terms and Conditions requires that a contractor will, if requested by an authorised Prison Service representative, provide details of the qualifications (including copies of certificates if requested) and experience of any person employed by the contractor for the delivery of education services to the establishment.

Prisoners' Telephone Conversations

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason telephone conversations between solicitors and their clients are tape recorded at

Her Majesty's Prison Whitemoor; when this practice started; and if he will make a statement. [908]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Chris Mullin, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the tape recording of telephone calls between solicitors and their clients at Whitemoor prison.

The policy on the use of cardphones by prisoners is set out in Circular Instruction 21/1992, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. A copy is attached for ease of reference. This states that all calls made by prisoners using the cardphone system will be recorded and are liable to be monitored. Cardphones are provided for use only by those prisoners who consent to this. Cardphones were introduced into most parts of Whitemoor in 1992 and into the special secure unit in June 1995.

Use of a cardphone is a privilege and prisoners are informed that it is not possible to guarantee the confidentiality of conversations with their legal advisers using the system. Prisoners at Whitemoor are advised to communicate legally privileged information either by letter or during a visit.

The arrangements for prisoners' access to the cardphone system at Whitemoor are in accordance with current policy and are the same as those for all closed establishments within the prison estate.

Prison Budgets

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent changes have been made to the budget allocations of prison governors; on what date these were made; to which financial years they refer; and if he will list the changes in allocation for each private prison. [387]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about changes to the budget allocations of prison governors and private prisons.

Budgets for individual prisons are set at the start of each financial year and then changed as necessary in the light of operational requirements. This year there have been a number of adjustments for directly managed prisons. Payments which the Prison Service makes to the privately managed prisons are unchanged as their precise operating budgets are a matter for the companies concerned.

Prisoners

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently restricted to their cells for up to 18 hours a day as a result of (a) staff shortages and (b) sickness leave among prison staff. [135]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how many prisoners are currently restricted to their cells for up to 18 hours a day as a result of (a) staff shortages and (b) sickness leave among prison staff:

The information is not available in the form requested. Figures are available, however, on the average time spent unlocked from cells. These figures show that, in the week commencing 13 November 1995, six prisons (Birmingham, Leeds, Liverpool, Winchester, Chelmsford and Feltham) reported average unlocking figures of less than eight hours per week day. The population of these establishments restricted to their cells up to 18 hours a day constitutes 2.9 per cent. of the total prison population.

We do not record centrally the various factors which account for establishment's performance on unlocking.

Young Offenders

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young offenders sentenced under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 were in custody on the last date for which figures are available; and of those in custody, how many were (a) in local authority secure accommodation, (b) in prison department custody and (c) detained under mental health legislation. [631]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 22 November 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 23 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking how many young offenders sentenced under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 were in custody on the last date for which figures are available; and of those in custody, how many were (a) in local authority secure accommodation, (b) in prison department custody and (c) detained under mental health legislation

On 20 November 1995 114 persons were detained in local authority secure accommodation and 445 in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales under Section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1993. None were detained under mental health legislation.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rough Sleepers

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people he estimates sleep rough each night in Belfast; and what proportion of these are under 18 years of age. [11]

Mr. Moss: The chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, which has statutory responsibility to make provision for the homeless, has advised me that he has no evidence from official sources of anyone sleeping rough in Belfast.

Homelessness

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of Northern Ireland Housing Executive properties have been let to persons classified as homeless in each of the last 10 years. [12]

Mr. Moss: The Northern Ireland Housing Executive has statutory responsibility to deal with the homeless under the provisions of the Housing (NI) Order 1988. While precise figures are not available, it is estimated that the proportion of lettings by the Housing Executive to those accepted as homeless, since 1989–90, the first full year of operation of the homelessness legislation, is as follows:

1989–90: 21 per cent.
1990–91: 32 per cent.
1991–92: 36 per cent.
1992–93: 38 per cent.
1993–94: 37 per cent.
1994–95: 36 per cent.

Divorce

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if it is his policy that Northern Ireland should be included in the proposed divorce law reform Bill; [71]

(2) if he will indicate the present major differences in the divorce laws as between Northern Ireland and Great Britain, and what work is in hand to draft proposals to bring the two sets of laws in line. [70]

Sir John Wheeler: The Family Law Bill which includes the proposed reforms on divorce does not extend to Northern Ireland. There are at present no major differences in the substantive divorce law as between Northern Ireland and England and Wales; but there are a number of differences in the practice and procedure between the two jurisdictions.

It has therefore been decided to undertake a comprehensive research exercise to examine the operation of divorce law in Northern Ireland. Ministers here will await the outcome of that research before giving careful consideration to the need for reform of the law in Northern Ireland.

Education (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will describe the system of prioritisation and decision making in the allocation of capital funding for capital expenditure on education in Northern Ireland; [1109]

(2) what proposals he has to introduce medium and long-term planning and greater transparency into the allocation of capital funds for educational purposes. [1108]

Mr. Ancram: There are well-established procedures for the planning of major capital projects in the education service. In the case of the schools sector, which has the majority of building needs, the system of prioritisation places each major works project in one to seven priority categories, based on an objective assessment of need. My Department reviews and updates and updates the capital needs of the education estate each year in consultation with the education and library boards, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools and other education authorities.

The medium and long-term priorities for the planning of individual major works are determined from these planning systems and the available resources are allocated to the highest priorities based on educational need. The available capital resources are reviewed annually in the public expenditure survey.

Unclaimed Benefits

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what estimates he has made of the total amount of unclaimed income support in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) North Antrim; [33]

(2) what estimate he has made of the total amount of unclaimed family credit for (a) Northern Ireland and (b) North Antrim; [31]

(3) what estimate he has made of the total amount of unclaimed sickness benefit for (a) Northern Ireland and (b) North Antrim; [35]

(4) what estimate he has made of the total amount of unclaimed disability living allowance for (a) Northern Ireland and (b) North Antrim; [34]

(5) what estimate he has made of the total amount of unclaimed benefits in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) North Antrim. [32]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [38]

Sir John Wheeler: This Department has introduced no such Acts since January 1994. The following Orders in Council under the Northern Ireland Act 1974, which equate to primary legislation for Northern Ireland during direct rule, have been made in that period and affect local government—

The Airports (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 (management of local airports);

The Litter (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 (litter control powers);

The Rates (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 (rating);

The Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 (miscellaneous amendments to local government law).

Drug and Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will specify where drug and alcohol abuse advice and counselling is presently carried out in the North Down and Ards Community Health trust; and what locations other than Bingham street, Bangor (a) have been and (b) are being considered for a drug and alcohol abuse advice centre. [69]

Mr. Moss: North Down and Ards Community HSS trust currently provides drug and alcohol addiction services from 52A Church street, Newtownards, Ards hospital, Bangor health centre, Donaghadee health centre and Portaferry health centre.

Premises at 10–14 Victoria road, Bangor, were considered, in addition to those in Bingham street, for a new home for the trust's addiction team.

North Down and Ards Community HSS trust is anxious to find suitable accommodation for this service but, to date, no final decision has been made.

Breast Cancer

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have died of breast cancer in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years; and what comparisons his Department has conducted in respect of the incidence of breast cancer in other regions of the United Kingdom. [76]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is as follows:

		Northern Ireland		England and Wales		Scotland
Year	Female or Male	Total	Rate per 100,000	Total	Rate per 100,000	Total	Rate per 100,000
1990	Female	295	36.5	13,634	52.5	1,250	47
	Male	—	—	107	.43	7	.28
1991	Female	339	41.7	13,786	52.9	1,278	48
	Male	3	0.4	83	.33	4	.16
1992	Female	308	37.2	13,663	52.2	1,250	47
	Male	—	—	92	.37	6	.24
1993	Female	331	40.6	13,026	49.6	1,280	48
	Male	8	1.0	87	.35	5	.20
1994	Female	338	40.2	12,830	48.8	1,275	48
	Male	—	—	88	.35	3	.12

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to improve preventive breast cancer services in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [77]

Mr. Moss: The Northern Ireland breast screening programme is continually monitored in order to modify it as necessary to maintain and improve its effectiveness. In addition Northern Ireland is participating with other United Kingdom Health Departments in research to improve the breast screening programme.

Private Landlords

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the major differences in the law relating to the tenants of private landlords in Northern Ireland and their position in relation to rent, repairs and security of tenure as opposed to those in England and Wales; and to what extent the Government propose to move the Northern Ireland law into line with England and Wales. [72]

Mr. Moss: The legislation governing the private rented sector in Northern Ireland is significantly different than in England and Wales.

In England and Wales there are three main types of tenancy:

(i) regulated—commenced before 15 January 1989 subject to a fair rent with considerable security of tenure and the landlord normally responsible for the repairs;

(ii) assured—from 15 January 1989 landlords could create an assured tenancy with rent charged at open market levels;

(iii) assured shorthold—allows landlords to let their property for a fixed period, which must be for a minimum of 6 months, in the certainty that they can gain possession at the end of it.

In both assured and assured shorthold tenancies, repairing obligations are largely a matter of negotiation between landlord and tenant.

In Northern Ireland there are also three main types of tenancy:

(i) restricted—properties generally in a poor state of repair with Net Annual Value (NAV) less than £60 and rent frozen at the 1978 level (usually less than £1.00 per week). Tenants have few repairing rights unless there is a tenancy agreement stating otherwise.

(ii) regulated—properties in a better state of repair. Rent payable limited to the amount calculated in accordance with statute and registered with the Department of the Environment (NI) and can be appealed to a Rent Assessment Committee. The responsibility for repairs may be set out in the tenancy agreement but will normally be the responsibility of the landlord who can be required to carry out repairs by the 'certificate of disrepair' procedure.

Both regulated and restricted tenants have considerable security of tenure whereby the landlord can gain possession only after obtaining a court order.

(iii) uncontrolled—properties built or converted after 1956, or which have an NAV over £140 or which were not previously let. Rent, repairing obligations and security of tenure are a matter between landlord and tenant to be specified in the tenancy agreement.

The Government have no proposals at present to amend the Northern Ireland law relating to the private rented sector.

Rural Development

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the implementation of the proposals contained in the White

Paper on Rural England (Cm 3016) in respect of Northern Ireland with particular reference to (a) business rate release schemes, (b) affordable housing in the countryside, (c) encouragement for the re-use of rural buildings and (d) the introduction a new rural business use class. [51]

Mr. Moss: The Government are currently considering the implications for Northern Ireland of the White Paper on Rural England. These considerations will take account of the different circumstances and the existing methods of support for rural communities in Northern Ireland. I will inform the hon. Gentleman once the consideration has been completed and the decision made on the way forward.

EU Funds (Transfrontier Projects)

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the Court of Auditors' report in respect of British misuse of funds in transfrontier projects in Northern Ireland. [1041]

Sir John Wheeler: The Court of Auditors noted that the number of transfrontier projects was relatively low. However, it did not suggest that there was any misuse of funds or that expenditure was undertaken in ineligible areas or projects or that expenditure was undertaken that was at variance with the twin objectives of the Interreg programme. Indeed the independent mid-term evaluation of the programme noted that it had been very effective, particularly given the difficult situation pertaining at that time.

Firearms

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has for reviewing the law on firearms. [2798]

Sir John Wheeler: The Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 provides for the licensing and control of firearms in the Province. Although it has been amended on a number of occasions, most recently last year when new offences relating to imitation firearms were introduced, the law has been largely unchanged since the 1960s. Indeed its origins can be traced back to the 1920s. This in itself would suggest reasonable cause for a fresh look at the law. However, in addition, developments in firearms technology and design have proceeded apace and we have seen a growth nationally in the recreational and sporting use of firearms. For these reasons therefore, I believe that the time is right to take a new look at the law on firearms, to ensure not only that it is appropriate to today's conditions, but that it strikes the right balance between public and individual safety and the reasonable expectations of shooters who want to use their firearms in a responsible and legitimate manner.

The review will be thorough and painstaking. There is much ground to cover. I will, of course, want to take the views of the shooting organisations as well as public representatives, the RUC and safety groups. To that end, I am writing today to Northern Ireland Members and my officials are similarly writing to the political party organisations and other interest groups inviting comment and proposals on what changes to the law they would like to see.

The review team will work under the direction of a steering committee comprising a senior NIO official, assisted by a senior RUC officer with experience in firearms administration and a person of standing with relevant expertise. I have asked them to complete their work and to let me have their report with proposals for change, by August 1996. Thereafter I will publish the proposals for wider consultation. I do not expect new legislation to be in place before the latter part of 1997.

SCOTLAND

Research

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about prior options reviews of the Scottish Crop Research Institute, the Macaulay Land Use Research Institute, the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency, the Fisheries Research Services and the Forestry Commission's Research Establishments. [2561]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: As part of a wider series of prior options reviews of public sector research establishments announced in the Government's response to the report of the multidepartmental efficiency scrutiny of public sector research establishments (Cm 2991), my Department, together with the Forestry Commission, will conduct prior options reviews of the Scottish Crop Research Institute—SCRI—the Macaulay Land Use Research Institute—MLURI—the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency—SASA—the Fisheries Research Services—and the Forestry Commission's Research Establishments.

I would welcome comments from interested parties. They should be sent by 8 January to:

Public Appointments

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the vacancies during the first six months of 1996 on quangos, outside bodies and agencies to which he has the right to make appointments. [570]

Mr. George Kynoch: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [27]

Mr. George Kynoch: The relevant Acts are as follows:

The Local Government etc (Scotland) Act 1994.
Children (Scotland) Act 1995.
Requirements of Writing (Scotland) Act 1995.
Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1995.
Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.
Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995.
Criminal Procedure (Consequential Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1995.
Proceeds of Crime (Scotland) Act 1995.

Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is his policy in relation to the application of TUPE in the case of portering staff at the Royal Alexandra hospital in Paisley; how much has been spent by (a) his Department, (b) Argyll and Clyde health board and (c) the Royal Alexandra hospital trust on legal and other fees in opposing the claim by portering staff; and if he will make a statement; [1001]

(2) what is his latest estimate of the total cost to public funds of the dispute between Argyll and Clyde health board or its successor trust and portering staff at the Royal Alexandra hospital trust since 1 December 1992; what is his latest estimate of the amount that would have been required to settle the claim on the terms submitted by the portering staff; and if he will make a statement. [571]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In any market testing programme it is for the health board or NHS trust concerned to consider the implications of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981—TUPE—in awarding contracts.

Records have not been kept of the management and administrative costs incurred by officers of the Argyll and Clyde health board and the Royal Alexandra hospitals NHS trust in dealing with the claim made by UNISON on behalf of portering staff. Similarly it is not possible to hypothecate the legal costs incurred prior to 1 April 1995. Since that date the Royal Alexandra hospital NHS trust has spent £2,178.60 on legal fees arising from this action.

The claims submitted by the individual porters concerned have yet to be validated and will be the subject of further discussions. It would be misleading to provide any estimate of the value of these claims at this stage.

Bail Statistics

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many defendants in Scotland are annually awarded bail; how many offend on bail; and how many do not offend whilst on bail. [1195]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: During 1994, 35,780 bail orders were issued. In some cases a defendant may have more than one outstanding bail order. No information is available on the number of defendants who did, or did not subsequently offend while on bail although information is available on the number of offences of "offending while on bail" recorded by the police. In 1994, 25,766 such offences were recorded. As several counts of "offending while on bail" can relate to the breach of only one bail order, careful interpretation of this figure is required."

Custodial Sentencing

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to ensure that differences in sentencing in Scotland by individual sheriffs are eliminated in accordance with the Scottish Office research paper, "Patterns of Custodial Sentencing in the Sheriff Court". [1193]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government invited views on a number of possible changes intended to improve consistency, clarity and predictability to sentencing in the consultation paper, "Sentencing and Appeals" which was published in January 1994. Our conclusions were given in the White Paper, "Firm and Fair" (Cm 2600) which announced our intention to promote a specific statutory power to allow the Appeal Court to issue judgments establishing general sentencing guidelines. The relevant provision is included as section 34 to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1995.

Prisoner Costs

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average cost of keeping a prisoner in custody in Scotland; and what are the relative costs of the community disposals available to the courts including each of those programmes provided by (a) social work departments, (b) Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders and (c) other independent agencies. [1286]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The annual cost per prisoner place at HM prisons in Scotland in 1994–95, calculated as total net expenditure—excluding capital—divided by the average number of places available, was £26,479. The average cost per order in 1994–95 of probation and community service disposals available to the courts in Scotland, were £1,588 and £1,446 respectively. The costs of individual programmes provided by local authorities, either directly or through independent agencies such as SACRO, as components of a court order, are not generally identifiable separately within the grants made available to local authorities for criminal justice social work services. As the duration, objectives and content of the community-based programmes vary considerably, the unit costs of individual programmes are not readily comparable.

Drugs (Exports)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what controls are placed on pharmaceutical wholesalers to ensure that drugs intended for export are not sold domestically. [1578]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Under medicines legislation, wholesale dealer's licences are required for the export of medicinal products to countries which form part of the European Community or European economic area agreement. It is a condition of such licences that medicinal products are sold only to those who may legally sell or supply them by way of retail in the country concerned or are themselves holders of wholesale dealer's licences.

Wholesale dealer's licences are not required for the export of medicinal products to countries outside the European Community or European economic area agreement.

Any reports that medicinal products sold for export have been subsequently sold in the United Kingdom would be investigated by the Medicines Control Agency.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many appointments to quangos in Scotland he intends to review in response to the reform of local government in Scotland in April 1996; and what plans he has to issue instructions to non-departmental public bodies asking them to review their membership in respect of local government reform. [1189]

Mr. George Kynoch: There are no plans to review appointments made by my right hon. Friend to public bodies as a result of local government reform. As a general rule members of public bodies, i.e. nationalised industries, non-departmental public bodies and NHS bodies listed in the annual Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies", are appointed as individuals and not as representatives of any particular interest group. Similarly there are no plans to ask non-departmental public bodies to review their membership in the light of local government reform. My right hon. Friend will continue to give full opportunities to members of local authorities to serve on public bodies, as recent experience with the new water and sewerage authorities and Customers Council has demonstrated.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures his Department has taken to ensure that financial subsidy from the new unitary councils will be given to facilitate the continuing operation of the rail services operated by ScotRail within Strathclyde following local government reform. [1741]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office will continue to provide funding through aggregate external finance for local authorities' current expenditure, including rail services in the Strathclyde area, from 1 April 1996.

Mediation and Reparation Projects

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what funding he intends to make available to procurators fiscal in Glasgow and Edinburgh mediation and reparation projects similar to those operating in Aberdeen and Motherwell/Hamilton as an alternative to the court process for victim and accused. [1264]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Diversion from prosecution projects, including mediation and reparation, are not funded through the procurator fiscal service. In 1995–96, the Scottish Office will make available £52,180 and £75,277 through the urban programme for mediation and reparation projects in Aberdeen and Motherwell/Hamilton respectively. A further £25,680 is provided for the project in Motherwell/Hamilton through 100 per cent. funding of criminal justice social work services. There are a number of additional mediation and reparation programmes, funded through the urban programme, but which are not specifically related to the criminal justice system. Pilot schemes which were provided in Glasgow and Edinburgh by the Scottish Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, through short-term funding under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, are no longer in operation.

The Scottish Office plans to invite local authorities to submit proposals for inclusion in a pilot programme within 100 per cent. funding of criminal justice social work services to assess the costs and effectiveness of diversion from prosecution schemes. This will be pursued in the light of available resources and other priorities. There will be scope for including mediation and reparation projects in such diversion scheme applications.

Kincraig Committee

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the proposals of the Kincraig committee were implemented; what considerations underlie the timetable for their revocation; and if he will make a statement. [1497]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The changes in the law governing early release of prisoners, which arose from the Government's consideration of the review of parole conducted by the committee chaired by the hon. Lord Kincraig, were enacted in the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993. The early release provisions of that Act came into force on 1 October 1993 and will continue to apply to prisoners sentenced since that date.

In his announcement issued on 12 October 1995 my right hon. Friend outlined proposals for further changes to the law on early release which will be the subject of consultation in the near future. The Government's detailed proposals, including the possible timescale for their implementation, will be contained in a White Paper which we aim to publish next year in the light of the results of consultation. The intention is that changes in legislation on early release arising from these proposals would apply only to those sentenced on or after the date the changes came into effect.

Development Corporations

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement indicating for each of the development corporations in Scotland the results of the ballots so far undertaken in relation to the transfers of housing stock to alternative landlords in advance of the wind up of the corporations; what were the bodies involved in the ballots; what were the number of votes cast for each body involved in the ballot; what was the percentage of votes cast for each organisation; what was the body to which the properties were transferred following the ballot; and what were the amounts bid successfully in each ballot. [1259]

Mr. George Kynoch: Tenants of Glenrothes and East Kilbride development corporations have been balloted to determine their future landlord. The information requested is set out in the tables.

Glenrothes Development Corporation

The houses are due to transfer at the end of November to East Kilbride District Council. The Council's bid was £63 million.
[1] Where there was one prospective landlord the percentage of votes was less than 100 per cent. because a number of tenants voted against that landlord.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which NHS trusts (a) have their trust board meetings open to the public, (b) have their board meetings partially open to the public and (c) have their board meetings closed to the public as referred to in his answer of 26 October. [1553]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is as follows:

(a) Open to the public:

Caithness and Sunherland NHS Trust
Edinburgh Sick Children's NHS Trust
Kirkcaldy Acute Hospitals NHS Trust
Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh NHS Trust
Stirling Royal Infirmary NHS Trust
West Lothian NHS Trust

(b) Partially open to the public:

Argyll and Bute NHS Trust
Ayrshire and Arran Community Healthcare NHS Trust
Borders General Hospital NHS Trust
Dundee Healthcare NHS Trust
East and Midlothian NHS Trust
Glasgow Dental Hospital and School NHS Trust
Greater Glasgow Community and Mental Health Services NHS Trust
Hairmyres and Stonehouse Hospital NHS Trust
Moray Health Services NHS Trust
North Ayrshire and Arran NHS Trust

Prisoners (Early Release)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what would be the effect on the average daily population in penal establishments in Scotland if remission were revoked. [1496]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government will be consulting soon on our proposals for changes to the early release arrangements for prisoners in Scotland. In the light of consultation, the Government will publish a White Paper in the course of next year. As assessment of the effects of the proposals upon the prison population is one of the matters I expect to be included in that paper.

Law and Order

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his plans for law and order in Scotland, and what is the period time for the consultation process indicated in his announcement of 12 October. [1261]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In his announcement on 12 October, my right hon. Friend re-affirmed the Government's commitment to law and order in Scotland and highlighted the measures taken in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1995 which will bring about improvements in the detection, prosecution and conviction of offenders. He also stressed the Government's view that there should be greater honesty in sentencing and outlined his proposals for changes to the early release arrangements for prisoners in Scotland. A consultation paper inviting comments on the range of issues to be considered will be issued soon.

Health Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the date of the termination of contract in respect of each (a) chief executives of NHS trust and (b) general managers of health boards in Scotland. [1186]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Prisoner Statistics

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what variations exist between the average daily prison population in western states in the Council of Europe; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for these variations, with particular reference to Scotland. [1414]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Table 1 shows the latest comparable available information on the average daily prison population—and rate per 100,000 population—in the western states in the Council of Europe. Table 2 shows the information for the constituent countries within the United Kingdom.

Table 1: Prison population as at 1 September 1993[1]

	Number	Rate per 100,000 population
Austria	7,099	91.0
Belgium	7,203	72.1
Cyprus	188	30.0
Denmark	3,702	71.0
Finland	3,132	61.8
France	51,134	86.3
Germany	65,838	81.0
Greece	6,524	68.0
Iceland	103	38.9
Italy	50,794	89.0
Luxembourg	425	107.5
Netherlands	7,843	51.0
Norway	2,607	60.0
Portugal	10,904	111.0
Republic of Ireland	2,108	59.8
Spain	45,711	114.9
Sweden	5,794	66.0
Switzerland	5,627	81.0
Turkey	31,304	51.6
United Kingdom	53,435	91.8

Source: Council of Europe Sourcebook.

[1] Some countries were unable to provide this information as at 1 September 1993 therefore the exact date used varies between countries.

Table 2: Prison population as at 1 September 1993

	Number	Rate per 100,000 population
England and Wales	45,633	89.0
Northern Ireland	1,902	118.0
Scotland	5,900	115.0

The figures in table 1 include all categories of prisoners, that is untried remanded in custody, convicted awaiting sentence, sentenced and civil prisoners. Comparisons of these figures must be treated with caution. There are a number of reasons for variations in the rate per 100,000 population across member states, such as different legal systems, sentencing policies and disposals available, variable use of custodial remand, different ages of criminal responsibility and different ages of entry into the prison system. The Council of Europe "Sourcebook" does not cover these issues in detail.

Temazepam

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many deaths in each of the past five years are attributable to abuse of temazepam in each health board area in Scotland. [1506]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Reliable information on the numbers of such deaths is not available for the years prior to 1994. The figures for 1994 are given in the table:

Deaths in Scotland from drug abuse[1] where temazepam was mentioned, by health board area, 1994.

[1] Deaths coded to WHO International Classification of Diseases (9th Revision) codes 304 and 305.

Improvements in the collection of information on such deaths were introduced in 1994. A full description of these changes is given in the report, "Collection of information on drug related deaths by the General Register Office for Scotland", a copy of which is in the Library.

Long-term Care

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the population in long-term care in Scotland, over 65 years of age, each of the years between 1983 and 1993, by residency in all homes, local authority homes, voluntary homes and private homes. [1139]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The table shows the information available:

[1] Prior to 1985 it is not possible to separate Registered data into Private and Voluntary Homes.

[2] Figures include short-term care residents (e.g. holiday and respite care).

[3] 1989 data has been given on both the old and new basis to aid comparison.

The 1994 figures have been included in the answer as the 1994 "Community Care Bulletin," which contains this information is published on 22 November 1995.

Criminal Justice Social Work Projects

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the (a) pilot bail supervision and accommodation project in Lothian region, (b) intensive probation project in Falkirk and (c) alcohol education probation project in Edinburgh and Midlothian; and what measures he will be taking to ensure that a greater number of courts in Scotland have community disposals available to sheriffs. [1265]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Bail supervision and accommodation projects in Lothian and Strathclyde regions are being funded on a pilot basis by the Scottish Office within 100 per cent. Central Government funding of criminal justice social work services. The projects are currently the subject of a research study by the MVA Consultancy which is due to report in spring 1996.

The intensive probation project in Falkirk is currently funded through the urban programme and the alcohol education probation project in Edinburgh and Midlothian through 100 per cent. funding. The urban programme requires monitoring by the responsible local authority and a concluding report of the Scottish Office. The Falkirk project is due to terminate in 1998. All criminal justice social work projects are subject to annual evaluation as part of local authority planning of these services.

Probation and community service are available in all sheriff courts in Scotland. It is for local authorities, in consultation with sentencers, independent sector providers and other criminal justice interests, to propose, within available resources and national priorities, the range of individual projects and specialist services to be provided as a component of a court order.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the average costs per week in Scotland for (a) private nursing homes, (b) residential homes, (c) NHS care of the elderly, (d) NHS long stay people with learning difficulties, (e) NHS psychiatric long stay and (f) NHS chronic young sick. [1271]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information for residential homes and NHS specialty groups is set out in the tables. The Scottish Office does not collect information on the average costs of private nursing homes.

Average gross weekly charge per resident in residential care homes (all client groups) in Scotland at 31 March 1994

Local authority	269
Private	254
Voluntary	271
All sectors	266

The gross weekly charge in local authority run homes is the full cost to the local authority for providing accommodation per resident.

For private and voluntary establishments, the gross weekly charge is as specified in contracts with the local authority.

Average cost per inpatient week in Scotland for specified NHS specialty groups, 1994–95

Geriatric long stay	629
Mental handicap	686
Psychiatry long stay	691
Young chronic sick	853

Psychiatry long stay includes geriatric psychiatry, child psychiatry, adolescent psychiatry and mental illness.

Manufacturing and Service Industry

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an assessment of the contribution of Scottish manufacturing and service industry exports to the balance of payments. [1319]

Mr. George Kynoch: Information on Scottish exports is available from the Scottish Council for Development and Industry.

In 1993 Scottish manufactured exports totalled £11,540 million. The Scottish council estimated that Scottish manufactured exports accounted for 10.3 per cent. of the United Kingdom manufactured exports.

Service sector exports were estimated at £403 million in 1993.

Health Board Budgets

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the surplus or deficit in their budgets at the end of the relevant financial year for each health board in Scotland for each financial year since 1987–88; what percentage this represented of their total budget; and what was their actual expenditure in each of these financial years. [1714]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is given in the tables. The figures are based on health board annual accounts and those for 1994–95 are provisional.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance his Department issued to Scottish health boards relating to the retention of a surplus in their budgets at the end of the last financial year. [1715]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Guidance is contained in the Scottish Accounting Manual issued by the Department to all health boards. This states that an underdrawing of up to 1 per cent. of a health board's cash limit may be carried forward from one year to another and that any overdrawing will be carried forward as a first charge against the following year's cash limit.

Ardrossan, Saltcoats, Stevenston Bypass

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on proposals for the Ardrossan, Saltcoats and Stevenston bypass. [1736]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In my answer to the hon. Member on 8 June 1995, Official Report, column 212 I explained that a revised design for a more northerly bypass was being developed. I expect this work to be completed soon.

Health Board Managers

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance has been issued to Scottish health boards relating to the publication of the figures for the performance-related pay element in the salaries of the general managers of these health boards. [1738]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Guidance issued in 1994 by the NHS in Scotland management executive said that any performance-related pay should be included in the total remuneration of the board general manager to be shown in the board annual report.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current position of Scottish Homes' plans for the transfer of its housing stock within (a) the Cunninghame, South constituency and (b) Ayrshire as a whole. [1740]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Scottish Homes local stock strategy sets out its proposals for ballot areas in Ayrshire. A copy was sent to the hon. Member. Since its publication Scottish Homes has received outline proposals and registered the interest of alternative landlords in the following ballot areas:

Cumnock etc—Shire Housing Association Steering Group
Patna, Delmellington—Shire Housing Association Steering Group
Drongan—Shire Housing Association Steering Group
Coylebank Housing Co-op Steering Group
Ardrossan—Cunninghame Housing Association
Saltcoats and Stevenston

Further ballot areas have been identified for Scottish Homes houses at:

Irvine (Cunninghame South Constituency)
Ayr
Dailly, Girvan
Kilmarnock, Stewarton
Crosshouse
Kilbirnie, Beith, Dalry

Outline proposals for these areas will be invited from alternative landlords during 1996.

Ravenspark Hospital, Irvine

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he anticipates approval to be given by his Department to the closure of Ravenspark hospital in Irvine. [1737]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: Ayrshire and Arran health board's extensive public consultation exercise on the future of Ravenspark hospital ended on 30 October this year. The board expects to discuss its proposals and the outcome of the consultations at its next board meeting on 30 November. I look forward to receiving its proposals in due course.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Assisted Places

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the ownership of a house worth £500,000 renders an individual who has no current income ineligible for an assisted place for his or her child; [1000]

(2) if the ownership of a house worth £700,000 and investments of £140,000 assuming a net interest rate of 6 per cent. but no other current income renders an individual ineligible for an assisted place for his or her child. [999]

Mrs. Gillan: The selection of pupils for assisted places is carried out by participating schools. The amount of assistance available under the scheme is determined by parent's total gross income from all sources. Children would be eligible for assistance from the scheme if their parents had no current income, or if their only income was £8,400 per annum from investments.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what plans she has to amend the regulations on income in respect of the assisted places scheme; [187]

(2) what plans she has to include capital assets and investments in deciding who should qualify for an assisted place; [177]

(3) what plans she has to raise the income ceiling below which parents qualify for an assisted place. [188]

Mrs. Gillan: Eligibility conditions and means-testing arrangements for assisted places are set out in regulations which are revised annually.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average cost of (a) an assisted place and (b) a place in the state secondary sector. [213]

Mrs. Gillan: The estimated average cost of public funds for an assisted pupil in England in the financial year 1995–96 is about £3,700 for ages 11 to 18. There is no directly comparable figure for the maintained sector. The average standard spending assessment allocation per pupil aged 11 to 16 in England in the financial year 1995–96 is some £2,600; for pupils aged above 16 it is about £3,600. The SSA figures exclude capital and certain other costs which may be subsumed in the assisted pupil figure.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the purpose of the assisted places scheme. [191]

Mrs. Gillan: The assisted places scheme gives able children from less well-off families an opportunity of an excellent academic education at one of England's best independent schools which would not otherwise have been available to them. This helps to promote choice and diversity and to raise standards.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many assisted places there are at Eton college. [211]

Mrs. Gillan: None at present.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to extend the assisted places scheme to preparatory schools. [189]

Mrs. Gillan: We will shortly be announcing our detailed plans for expanding the assisted places scheme as a whole.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what academic criteria are applied to decide whether a child already at a private school should have an assisted place; [210]

(2) what measures are in place to ensure that the advice of a private school at which an assisted places scheme applicant is already a pupil on that child's academic suitability for an award is accurate. [209]

Mrs. Gillan: The regulations require a school to be satisfied that a pupil selected for an assisted place is likely to benefit from the education provided. Subject to this and other general conditions of eligibility set out in the regulations and to any specific provisions in their participation agreements under the assisted places scheme, it is for each school to select pupils according to its own academic criteria, methods and procedures.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of pupils in private schools are holders of assisted places. [176]

Mrs. Gillan: Assisted place holders form just over 5 per cent. of pupils in all independent schools.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many private schools receive money from the APS. [212]

Mrs. Gillan: The assisted places scheme provides financial help for parents of pupils at participating schools, rather than for the schools themselves. At present 293 independent schools participate in the scheme in England.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent reviews her Department has carried out into the academic standards of schools to which assisted places scheme funds are paid. [190]

Mrs. Gillan: The academic standards of schools participating in the assisted places scheme are regularly monitored through data on the public examination performance and post-school destinations of their pupils, and through inspection by Ofsted.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of overall private school income derives from the APS. [178]

Mrs. Gillan: Information about the overall income of independent schools is not collected centrally.

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what access her Department has to Inland Revenue records in monitoring the validity of claims for assisted places. [186]

Mrs. Gillan: In order to be eligible for assistance under the scheme, parents are required to submit corroborative documentary evidence of their income to participating schools which carry out income assessments on behalf of the Department. Such evidence may include P60s and Inland Revenue tax assessments on schedule A, schedule D or schedule E. The Department regularly audits a sample of schools' assessments, including the supporting documentation.

Class Sizes, Dudley

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what has been the average size of class taught by one teacher in primary schools in Dudley metropolitan borough in each year since 1983; [579]

(2) what has been the average size of class taught by one teacher in secondary schools in Dudley metropolitan borough in each year since 1983. [577]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on average class sizes of single teacher classes in Dudley local education authority is shown in the table:

Average class sizes of single teacher classes in maintained schools in Dudley local education authority area

Remploy

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans the Government have to sell off Remploy. [1666]

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on 8 November 1995, Official Report, column 934.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many disabled people are employed in Scotland by Remploy (a) in Remploy factories and (b) in Interwork schemes. [806]

Mr. Paice: In Scotland, Remploy provide employment for 945 disabled people; 756 of these work in factories and 189 in Interwork.

Wakefield TEC

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what level of funding has been made available to Wakefield training and enterprise council for work in areas which have lost their mining industry. [121]

Mr. Paice: Over the last three years over £6 million has been available to Wakefield training and enterprise council to assist in areas affected by the closures of collieries. Other Government funding available to the TEC will also have benefited former mining areas.

HEALTH

Medicines Monitoring Unit

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding was given by his Department to the medicines monitoring unit in 1994–95 and 1995–96; and what level of funding for the unit is expected for 1996–97. [319]

Mr. Sackville: The level of funding from the Medicine Control Agency for 1994–95 for the Medicines Monitoring unit project was £111,424 and for 1995–96 it is expected to be £115,264.

Prescribed Drugs

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest available figure for the percentage of (a) hospital admissions and (b) community health services' patients receiving care as a result of adverse reactions to prescribed drugs. [544]

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available centrally. Information on the number of ordinary admissions and day cases associated with drugs, medicaments and biological substances causing adverse effects in therapeutic use in 1993–94 is published in "Hospital Episode Statistics, England, Volume 2", copies of which are available in the Library.

Accident and Emergency Admissions

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were admitted to hospital in each health region as (a) accident and emergency admissions and (b) surgical emergencies in each of the last five years; and how many have been admitted for these reasons so far this year. [321]

Mr. Sackville: The available information will be placed in the Library. The tables are based on raw data from the hospital episode statistics and have not been adjusted to take account of shortfalls in coverage.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration his Department has given to the possibility that the death of 19-year-old Stephen Churchill from Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease in May could be linked to BSE, what requests he has received for an inquiry into the cause of the death; and what was his response; and if he will make a statement. [152]

Mr. Sackville: The spongiform encephalopathy advisory committee, which provides the Government with independent expert advice on BSE and Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease, has advised that it is not possible to draw any conclusions in this case about a link with BSE as confirmed cases of CJD have been found in the same age group in other countries before the appearance of BSE. In addition, the case had no reported contact with BSE.

The question of an inquiry into the death of Stephen Churchill was first raised by the press. A number of letters have been received since in connection with the case. In view of the existence of the national CJD surveillance unit, which investigates the incidence and epidemiology of CJD in the UK since the advent of BSE; and of the SEAC, we do not consider that there is a need for an independent inquiry.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department is currently undertaking into (a) BSE and (b) Creutzfeldt-Jakob dementia; and if he will make a statement on BSE in the food chain. [1663]

Mr. Sackville: The Department of Health and the Scottish Office jointly fund the national Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease (CJD) surveillance unit which investigates the incidence and epidemiology of the disease, paying particular attention to occupation and eating habits, so that any change in the pattern of CJD following the advent of BSE can be detected.

The Department is also funding a series of studies at the Institute of Animal Health into time temperature combinations required to inactivate BSE and scrapie agents.

The Medical Research Council, the main body through which the Government fund medical research in the United Kingdom, receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and is carrying out research into transmissible spongiform encephalopathies aimed at increasing understanding of some of the biological processes involved in such diseases in man.

The independent expert spongiform encephalopathy advisory committee—SEAC—published "Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathies: A Summary of Present Knowledge and Research" on 7 February 1995. Copies of this report are available in the Library.

There is currently no scientific evidence to link BSE in cattle with the development of CJD in humans. All the information and evidence relating to the possibility of BSE entering the food chain is being looked at by SEAC.

Residential Care

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of those entering residential homes are considered severely or moderately disabled, according to the most recent statistics. [1128]

Mr. Bowis: Information on the degree of disability of individuals on entry to residential homes is not available centrally. Most people entering residential care should be regarded as having a significant degree of disability or disfunction. At 31 March 1994, about 80 per cent. of all residents in residential care homes were in homes for elderly people and a further 2.5 per cent. in home specifically catering for adults with physical and/or sensory disabilities. The number of physically disabled residents in nursing homes was about 15 per cent. of all residents in nursing homes.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many inquiries his Department has received in the last year concerning the transference of assets and its effect on residential care provision. [1131]

Mr. Bowis: Around 40 letters have been received in 1995 and numerous telephone inquiries.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average cost per week of residential care is in (a) England and Wales and (b) the west midlands. [1133]

Mr. Bowis: In 1993–94, the latest date for which information is available, the average expenditure per week on residential care for older people per local authority supported resident was approximately £265. Corresponding data for authorities in the west midlands are given as series HE1 in the unit costs section of "Key Indicators of Local Authority Social Services 1995", copies of which are available in the Library.

Information relating to Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Illness, Disability and Infirmity

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will define the distinctions recognised by his Department between illness and disability and infirmity. [1132]

Mr. Bowis: The Department does not use specific definitions to distinguish between illness, disability and infirmity. The provision of health and social care is expected to be based on a full assessment of an individual's needs.

Milk

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what inspections his officers are carrying out in dairies and supermarkets to ensure milk from (a) broken or (b) out-of-date cartons is not being recycled; [1262]

(2) when and from whom he first received representations as to the recycling of milk from broken or out-of-date cartons. [1263]

Mr. Sackville: My Department was first approached by The Observer on 3 November 1995 about this matter.

Allegations about the reprocessing of milk were subsequently brought to the attention of the appropriate local authority environmental health departments who have responsibility for inspections of dairies and supermarkets in their areas.

I understand that following this checks were made in two dairies, but no evidence was apparent of unhygienic practices or contraventions of food safety legislation.

Temazepam

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the amount of Temazepam per capita distributed annually in England; and if he will make a statement. [1542]

Mr. Bowis: It is 0.066g.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths in each of the past five years are attributable to the abuse of Temazepam (a) in England and (b) in each health region. [1543]

Mr. Bowis: The table shows the numbers of deaths due to Temazepam abuse, alone or with other drugs—ICDs'

304.1, 304.7, 304.8 305.4, 305.9—by year of occurrence for the latest five-year period available in England and each regional health authority.

Waiting Times

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is his policy on waiting times for initial appointments in NHS trust hospitals; [1170]

(2) if he will make a statement on waiting times for hospital appointments (a) in the NHS and (b) in private medical care. [1171]

Mr. Malone: Decisions on how quickly patients are seen following out-patient referral must be based on an assessment of clinical priority made by doctors. The revised patients charter, which came into effect on 1 April 1995, contains a national standard for the maximum time patients should have to wait for their first out-patient appointment: all patients should be seen within 26 weeks of written referral by their general practitioner, and nine out of 10 patients in each trust should be seen within 13 weeks.

The latest information available shows that in the quarter ended 31 June, 85 per cent. of patients seen had waited less than 13 weeks and 97 per cent. had waited less than 26 weeks. Where the standard is not being met, hospitals are required to have in place an action plan to reduce the waiting time to the charter standard.

No information is available centrally on appointments taking place in the private sector.

Long-stay Beds

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the number of long-stay beds in the national health service in 1990 for (a) the elderly, (b) psychiatry, (c) those with learning difficulties and (d) the chronically sick young; and what the figures are under these categories for 1 April. [1140]

(2) if he will estimate the number of available long-stay beds in the National Health Service by 1 April 1998 and 1 April 2000 for (a) the elderly, (b) psychiatry, (c) those with learning difficulties and (d) the chronically young sick. [1141]

Mr. Bowis: The information available is published in "Bed availability for England", copies of which are available in the Library.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what alternative arrangements apply in circumstances when a major hospital is closed to admissions and victims of major accidents; and if he will make a statement. [1151]

Mr. Sackville: Such closures are infrequent and generally of short duration. If national health service hospital trusts have to place restrictions on the cases that they can deal with, they should collaborate with health authorities, ambulance services and other hospitals to ensure that appropriate contingency measures are in place.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1444]

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Construction and Planning gave my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) on 17 May Official Report, columns 259–62, for energy consumption figures for the Department of Health.

Additional figures for 1994–95 will be published shortly. These are expected to show a decrease of 8 per cent. over the previous year, as a result of our continuing efforts to reduce energy consumption.

NHS Appointments (Doncaster)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) who will be responsible for the appointment of a chairman and non-executive directors to the Doncaster health authority in the period from 1 April 1996; [1820]

(2) who is responsible for the appointment of those non-executive directors of the Doncaster Healthcare trust and the Doncaster Royal Infirmary trust for whom he is not responsible. [1821]

Mr. Sackville: From 1 April 1996, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will be responsible for the appointment of the chairman and all non-executive directors to national health service trusts and health authorities. Trent regional health authority is at present responsible for the appointment of two of the non-executive directors at the Doncaster Healthcare trust and at the Doncaster Royal Infirmary and Montagu Hospital NHS trust.

Cheviot and Wandsbeck NHS Trust

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how long the former chief executive of the Cheviot and Wandsbeck NHS trust had been in post; and what reasons were given for his early retirement. [2232]

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for Cheviot and Wandsbeck National Health Service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the trust, Mr. Roger Baker for details.

Health Authorities

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will announce the boundaries of the new health authorities. [2560]

Mr. Malone: We are today announcing decisions on the boundaries of new health authorities in England which will come into operation on 1 April 1996. Details of the new boundaries will be placed in the Library.

Human Foetal Tissue

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the ethical issues arising from the Medical Research Council project at the Centre for Brain Repair involving the use of tissue from aborted babies; what steps are taken to ensure that the mothers of those babies are made aware of the purpose for which their dead children are being used; if he will indicate the cost of the project; and he will list the consultations which were undertaken with the public and interested organisations before the granting of the necessary approval for the project to proceed. [1343]

Mr. Sackville: I understand that the project is still at the planning stage and as yet no human tissue has being used, but future studies using human fetal tissue are being considered. Any such studies will follow the strict guidelines of the Polkinghorne report, Cm 762. Its recommendations, which were accepted by the Government and the British Medical Association, were that such tissue could be used for research and treatment. Such experimental proposals will be subjected to the appropriate scrutiny when they are submitted to the local research ethics committee.

Mrs. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list all those projects for which licences have been issued in each of the last five years and which have involved the use of tissue from aborted babies, indicating in each case the number of aborted babies involved; and if he will list the steps which his Department has taken in each of those cases to ensure that the provisions of the Polkinghorne report have been implemented; [1344]

(2) what administrative and reporting procedures are undertaken by his Department to monitor the issuing of licences for projects involving the use of tissue from aborted babies. [1345]

Mr. Sackville: Local research ethics committees—LRECs—advise within every health district on the acceptability of research proposals involving human subjects and human foetal tissue. Departmental guidance on the functions of LRECs includes the Polkinghorne code of practice, copies of which are available in the Library. The Department of Health does not collect information about research proposals approved by LRECs.

Genetic Screening

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the implications for public policy of developments in pre-natal genetic screening; [1346]

(2) if he will make a statement on the implications for public policy of developments in post-natal genetic screening. [1347]

Mr. Sackville: These issues are being considered in the light of the Select Committee on Science and Technology's report on human genetics. The Government's position will be set out in the published response to the Select Committee's report.

Psychotherapists (Children)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many child psychotherapists were working in the NHS in each region for (a) 1979, (b) 1984, (c) 1989 and (d) the latest available year; and if he will make a statement. [1664]

Mr. Bowis: The information available for English regions is shown in the table.

King's Healthcare NHS Trust

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provisions have been made by Kings Healthcare for on-site facilities to continue an integrated centre for epilepsy; and if he will make a statement. [2010]

Mr. Bowis: King's Healthcare National Health Service trust has assured me that it is committed to the Centre for Epilepsy and is working closely with the chairman of the centre to identify precisely how it will be accommodated in the future.

Nursing Agencies

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will specify the professional duties of registered employment agencies which specialise in hiring out auxiliary unqualified and qualified nurses, with respect to advice to client hospitals concerning past offences of falsely claiming nursing qualifications. [1730]

Mr. Sackville: Local authorities are responsible for licensing nurses agencies and for securing their proper conduct. Each placement made by an agency must be supervised by a registered nurse or medical practitioner.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 24 November 1995

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Ordtech

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General what advice he gave to Ministers before they signed public interest immunity certificates in relation to the initial Ordtech trial. [1024]

The Attorney-General: The signing of public interest immunity certificates in relation to the Ordtech trial falls within Sir Richard Scott's terms of reference. The Government will await Sir Richard's considered view on the Ordtech case.

HEALTH

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the Acts of Parliament including Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [24]

Mr. Bowis: There are none that affect local government directly.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the mental health task force submitted an overview report on the way purchasers and providers of mental health services were approaching the replacement of large mental hospitals, following its visits to health authorities early in 1994; and if it has been published. [1924]

Mr. Bowis: No specific report has been published on this part of the mental health task force's work. The main conclusions are summarised in section 4.2 of the task force's final report, copies of which are available in the Library.

NHS Appointments

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to require NHS auditors as part of their routine audit to ensure that checks against undischarged bankruptcy or criminal convictions on the appointment of chairmen, chief executives and directors have been carried out. [1788]

Mr. Malone: It is for the statutory auditor to investigate such matters as he sees fit and to satisfy himself accordingly.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to examine the implications of the European Court of Justice ruling on prescription charges for men aged 60 years and over for the treatment of the sexes in other areas of benefits and charges. [2593]

Mr. Malone: The ruling does not affect any other area of charges or benefits paid under national health service regulations.

Teenage Conceptions

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress towards the target of "The Health of the Nation" to reduce teenage conceptions. [3069]

Mr. Sackville: Recently published figures show that conception rates among girls under 16 have fallen for the third year running and by a fifth over those three years. While conception rates are still high by international standards, this encouraging reduction has reversed the upward trend of the 1980s and reflects valuable work on the part of all those who provide help and advice to young people. Further sustained effort will be necessary to maintain the downward trend towards the target of "The Health of the Nation".

NHS Contracts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many contracts have been made between purchasers and providers in the NHS in each of the last three years; [2413]

(2) how many GP fundholder contracts with providers have been made in each of the last three years. [2412]

Mr. Malone: In 1993–94 3,982 national health service contracts were agreed between district health authorities and trusts, in 1994–95 there were 3,505 and in 1995–96 there are 3,737 national health service contracts agreed. There is no information available centrally on the numbers of general practitioner fundholder contracts.

Non-NHS Providers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary for Health if he will itemise how much (a) NHS trusts, (b) general practitioner fundholders, (c) regional health authorities and (d) district health authorities spent on health care from non-NHS providers in each year since 1991–92 in each region. [2417]

Mr. Sackville: This information will be placed in the Library.

Extra-contractual Referrals

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many extra-contractual references have been made in the NHS in each of the last three years. [2410]

Mr. Malone: The information is not available centrally.

Private Patient Income

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish details on private patient income in the NHS for each of the last four years (a) by region, (b) by district and (c) by trust. [2430]

Mr. Sackville: The figures for 1994–95, 1992–93, and 1991–92 will be placed in the Library. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 13 January 1995, Official Report, columns 267–68 for figures for 1993–94.

Capital Expenditure

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total capital expenditure (a) for trusts and (b) for regions in each year from 1993–94, by region. [2418]

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 30 October 1995, Official Report, columns 34–35.

Continuing Care

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the level of reinvestment being planned by health authorities in continuing care provision in response to circular HSG(95)8. [2411]

Mr. Bowis: Health authorities are currently consulting on their draft policies and eligibility criteria for continuing health care. They are required to finalise these and any resulting changes in spending on continuing health care services by 1 April 1996.

ENVIRONMENT

Carbon Tax

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the introduction of a carbon tax on polluting industries. [1168]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friends have frequent discussions on matters of common interest, which from time to time include the question of a carbon tax.

The United Kingdom is committed under the framework convention of climate change to return emissions of all greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by the year 2000. We do not need a carbon tax to meet this commitment as, for carbon dioxide, we are on course to achieve reductions of 4 to 8 per cent. below 1990 emission levels.

This rate of progress puts us at the forefront of international efforts to combat climate change and demonstrates once again the Government's determination to deliver on their environmental commitments.

Energy Efficiency (Government Estate)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility, in each year since 1990. [1456]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Figures for the energy efficiency performance of the Government estate are published annually. The information given in the last report—published in the answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey, (Mr. Ainsworth) on 17 May 1995, Official Report, column 260—showed that the percentage reduction in the standard energy cost performance indicator for each year covered, relative to the base year 1990–91, for the Department of the Environment was as follows:

1991–92: 3 per cent.

1992–93: 5 per cent.

1993–94: 9 per cent.

Energy efficiency is an important aspect in the specifications for the new buildings which the Department will occupy once it vacates 2 Marsham street.

Air Pollution Monitoring

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the air pollution monitoring stations in Oxford and the London borough of Brent will be integrated into the national air monitoring network. [1805]

Mr. Clappison: The air pollution monitoring stations in Oxford and the London borough of Brent will be integrated into the national air monitoring network shortly.

Beverley Town

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he will use to decide whether the town of Beverley should be included in any forthcoming parish review. [1904]

Sir Paul Beresford: We are aware of the strong local desire for a parish council in Beverley town. We are currently considering what reviews the Local Government Commission should be directed to undertake in addition to its on-going programme of periodic electoral reviews.

Drought Orders

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many drought orders have been made in the south-west in 1995; what rivers they affect; how much water is to be extracted; and what is the duration of the order. [2061]

Mr. Clappison: Seven drought orders have been made so far in 1995 affecting the area for which South West Water Services Ltd. is the water undertaker. The details are as follows:

Made 7 September; in force for up to six months.

1. The South West Water Services Limited (Drought) Order 1995

The order authorised the imposition of restrictions on non-essential uses of water in parts of Carrick, Kerrier and Penwith districts.

2. The South West Water Services Limited (Drift Reservoir) (Drought) Order 1995

The order halved the minimum flow of compensation water required from Drift reservoir into the Newlyn river from 0.016 cubic metres a second to 0.008 cubic metres a second.

3. THE SOUTH WEST WATER SERVICES LIMITED (STITHIANS RESERVOIR) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995

The order halved the minimum flow of compensation water required from Stithians reservoir into the River Kennal from 0.0316 cubic metres a second to 0.0158 cubic metres a second.

4. THE SOUTH WEST WATER SERVICES LIMITED (RIVER HAYLE) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995

The order reduced the minimum flow required to be maintained in the River Hayle below the St. Erth intake from 0.222 cubic metres a second to 0.105 cubic metres a second.

5. THE SOUTH WEST WATER SERVICES LIMITED (LESWIDDEN POOL) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995

The order authorised the abstraction of not more than 5,460 cubic metres of water a day from Leswidden pool to boost the flow in Sancreed stream.

Made 20 September; in force for up to six months

6. THE SOUTH WEST WATER SERVICES LIMITED (HAWKS TOR PIT) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995

The order authorised the abstraction of up to 10,000 cubic metres of water a day from Hawks Tor Pit and its transfer by pipeline to the De Lank water treatment works.

Made 31 October; in force up to 31 December 1995

7. THE SOUTH WEST WATER SERVICES LIMITED (COLLIFORD LAKE) (DROUGHT) ORDER 1995

The order increases the amount of water that may be abstracted from Colliford Lake reservoir in 1995 from 5,390,000 cubic metres to 8,000,000 cubic metres.

Water Services

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will order an investigation into the investment activities of Yorkshire Water and Welsh Water. [1901]

Mr. Clappison: No. This is a matter for the Director General of Water Services.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was (a) the total education standard spending assessment for England and (b) the latest estimate of the actual expenditure by local authorities on education for 1995–1996. [2249]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information is as follows:

Expenditure on education by English local authorities 1995–96

	£ million
(a) Standard spending assessment	17,024
(b) Budgeted net revenue expenditure	17,821

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Underground and (b) London Transport buses while on official business. [379]

Mr. John. M. Taylor: I have used neither London Underground nor London Transport buses on official business in the last year.

Legal Aid (Immigration)

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many legal aid certificates were issued for advice and/or representation in cases arising out of the operation of the Immigration Acts; and what was the total cost for each of the past five successive years. [205]

Mr. John M. Taylor: It is not possible to identify separately the number of civil legal aid certificates arising out of the operation of the Immigration Acts. The figures for green form payments on all immigration and nationality matters are as follows. It is not possible to break them down any further.

Green form bills in immigration and nationality matters

Year	Number of cases	£ Expenditure
1990–91	14,660	2,652,770
1991–92	23,556	5,017,978
1992–93	30,443	7,247,751
1993–94	45,493	11,294,855
1994–95	51,828	14,572,056

Human Rights

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department upon which date before 1 January 1996 and with effect from which retrospective date the Lord Chancellor will introduce a measure to provide the effective remedy required under article 13 of the European convention on human rights for a violation of a citizen's right under article 6 of that convention where such violation is or was caused by the failure of the Law Society in the performance of its duties towards the supervision of solicitor officers of the court. [208]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government have no such plans. No further action is required of the Government to comply with article 6 of the European convention on human rights. It follows that article 13 has no application here.

Asylum Appeals

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many appeals against a refusal of asylum are currently outstanding with the Immigration Appellate Authority; and what was the equivalent figure on (a) 1 January 1995 and (b) on 1 January 1994. [569]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There were approximately 9,980 appeals outstanding on 31 October 1995, 3,400 on 1 January 1995 and 480 on 1 January 1994.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [45]

Mr. John M. Taylor: My Department has introduced no Act of Parliament during this period containing provisions which affect local government exclusively. However, the Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1995 effected the repeal of certain obsolete and unnecessary local enactments.

Jurors (Counselling)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what provisions are made for jury counselling at the conclusion of murder trials. [337]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Court Service makes no specific provision for jury counselling at the conclusion of murder trials. Where jurors who are distressed contact court staff, they are advised to contact their general practitioner or, if they prefer, a freephone healthline number which details counselling services available. Where the evidence in a case is particularly distressing, the Court Service offers further advice or assistance, where this is considered appropriate.

Immigration Adjudicators

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will provide a breakdown of the number of full-time and part-time special adjudicators employed by the Immigration Appellate Authority (a) at the present time, (b) on 1 January 1994 and (c) on 1 January 1993. [568]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There were no special adjudicators on 1 January 1993 as the Immigration Appeals Bill had not yet been enacted. The first special adjudicators were designated by the Lord Chancellor in July 1993. On 1 January 1994 there were 16 full-time immigration adjudicators and 15 part-time immigration adjudicators who were designated as special adjudicators by the Lord Chancellor. At the present time 25 full-time and 52 part-time immigration adjudicators are so designated.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Audiovisual Eureka

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what has been the outcome of the United Kingdom's presidency of the pan-European Audiovisual Eureka initiative. [3072]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am pleased to announce that I have today formally made the London declaration setting out a new role and objectives for Audiovisual Eureka. I do so having been notified by Ministers of 25 of the 33 participating Audiovisual Eureka countries, as well as by the Council of Europe, that they are content to see the declaration adopted. A copy of the declaration has been placed in the House Libraries.

The London declaration, negotiated under the United Kingdom presidency of Audiovisual Eureka—AVE—takes forward the recommendations of an independent evaluation of the initiative undertaken by management consultants, Coopers and Lybrand. The declaration refocuses the pan-European media initiative more narrowly and in keeping with its limited resources. The redefined objectives are to:

> strengthen and promote the audiovisual industry in the wider Europe, taking into account new technology;
> concentrate its activities on acting as an intermediary on the one hand between AVE countries not presently members of the European Union and, on the other, the members of the European Union, as well as European Community and other programmes and instruments applicable to the audiovisual sector; > initiative and further appropriate structural projects principally in the areas of training audiovisual professionals and the development and distribution of European audiovisual works; and > provide a range of project-related services targeted at small and medium-sized enterprises, in particular to foster partnerships involving countries with limited audiovisual capacity.

These objectives will be achieved through a four-year work programme prepared by the United Kingdom and Poland, as the current and future presidencies of AVE, which was approved by national co-ordinators from participating countries on 23 and 24 November in Strasbourg.

The declaration will take effect from 1 January 1996, which also marks the beginning of the new work programme. I expect all member countries of AVE to signal their acceptance of the declaration before then.

DEFENCE

Princess of Wales

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence of which regiments the Princess of Wales is colonel in chief. [2282]

Mr. Soames: The Princess of Wales is colonel in chief of the Light Dragoons and the Princess of Wales' Royal Regiment—Queen's and Royal Hampshires.

Training Areas

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which body was responsible for taking the decisions on the locations of the low-level operational training areas; and what other bodies were consulted prior to their establishment. [528]

Mr. Soames: The decisions on the locations of the tactical training areas were taken by the Ministry of Defence in consultation with National Air Traffic Services. Records to indicate whether any other bodies were consulted have not been retained.

Refits

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the last refitting dates of all (a) surface vessels and (b) submarines which have taken place over the last five years, indicating the cost of each refit. [463]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 20 November 1995]: The date and cost of refits undertaken over the last five years are:

Royal Ordnance plc

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the relationship between his Department, Royal Ordnance and PRB; and which countries were supplied with armaments and defence equipment arising from it. [996]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The question does not specify dates, but the Royal Ordnance factories were part of the Ministry of Defence until 2 January 1985, when the property, rights and liabilities were vested in Royal Ordnance plc. At this time, the company was wholly owned by the Government and the Secretary of State for Defence was the sole shareholder. RO plc from 2 January 1985 operated, as far as possible, as an independent company and acted commercially, under the terms of a memorandum of understanding. RO plc sold the tank factory in Leeds to Vickers plc in October 1986 and the sale of RO plc to British Aerospace was completed in April 1987. Since April 1987 the relationship between the Ministry of Defence and the company has been one of customer and supplier.

PRB was also a supplier to the Ministry of Defence, both directly and, we believe, indirectly, as a subcontractor to Royal Ordnance.

From 2 January 1985, exports by Royal Ordnance were subject to the normal licensing arrangements, but it has been the practice of successive Governments not to reveal information about individual defence exports.

Military Aircraft

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what procedures exist for military air traffic controllers to report breaches of active danger areas by military aircraft; and how many such breaches were reported in each of the last three years. [1298]

Mr. Soames: National Air Traffic Services procedures allow military air traffic controllers to report civil and military aircraft breaches of danger areas in the United Kingdom. In the event of a breach by UK-based military aircraft, a report is sent to the appropriate military operating authority. Reports of breaches by foreign military aircraft are sent to NATS. Where the aircraft operator is not known, breaches are reported initially to HQ Military Air Traffic Organisation so that the aircraft can be identified. Since the beginning of 1993, the number of infringements by military aircraft has been:

Year	Number
1993	3
1994	15
1995 (to date)	13

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the difference between a practice interception and a visual identification, in terms of the manoeuvres permitted by British military fighter aircraft when in the vicinity of a civil aircraft. [1305]

Mr. Soames: An interception is the initial manoeuvre flown by military aircraft to identify visually an aircraft which has penetrated the UK air defence region without warning. The practice of these manoeuvres is essential training for military aircrew, but any training involving civil aircraft is conducted only as part of a pre-briefed exercise and does not take place in controlled airspace.

Low Flying

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates in the past year on which fast jet low flying was authorised after 2300 hours; and what was the reason for the special authorisation in each case. [1286]

Mr. Soames: Fast jet low flying was authorised after 2300 hours on the nights of 8–9 and 9–10 June 1995 and 25–26 July 1995 to meet essential training requirements.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to use the automated low flying enquiry and notification system to monitor the concentrations of night low flying in particular areas over time, as an aid to managing the environmental impact of such flights. [1292]

Mr. Soames: The intention is to make the fullest practicable use of ALFENS, which will include such monitoring.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if military aircraft are permitted to carry out night low-flying sorties over the United Kingdom, other than in the highlands restricted area, in areas where the forecast weather is less than the minimum requirements for visual flight. [1304]

Mr. Soames: Outside the highlands restricted area, night low-flying sorties may be conducted only in areas where the weather conditions meet the minimum requirements for visual flight.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in introducing the ALFENS system; when he expects the system to reach its full operational capability; and how many United Kingdom air bases will have the system installed. [1293]

Mr. Soames: Tests of the system commenced in July 1995 as scheduled. These revealed a number of problems which are being resolved, in order to provide full operational capability as expected by mid-1996. ALFENS will be installed at 73 United Kingdom military bases.

Service Deaths

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates and circumstances of all deaths of service or civilian personnel in the past five years for which coroners' inquests or fatal accident inquiries have been held. [1294]

Mr. Soames: Information of the nature requested is not held centrally by my Department and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Purple Airspace

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many infringements of purple airspace have been reported in each year since 1990. [1276]

Mr. Soames: The information requested has been provided by National Air Traffic Services:

Year	Infringements by military aircraft	Infringements by civil aircraft
1990	2	5
1995 (to date)	1	0

There were no infringements of purple airspace recorded in 1991, 1992 or 1993.

AIRPROX

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessments he has made of the likely effects of the adoption of the AIRPROX system on the rates of aircraft proximity incident reporting by (a) pilots and (b) controllers. [1300]

Mr. Soames: The forthcoming introduction of the AIRPROX (Pilot) term may result in an increase in the number of aircraft proximity incidents since the new term has a wider definition than "airmiss" which it replaces. The introduction, last year, of the AIRPROX (Controller) has not resulted in a significant change in the number of incidents since the definition of the new term is the same as "Aircraft Proximity Hazard (APHAZ)" which it replaced.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to extend the AIRPROX (Controller) reporting system to military air traffic controllers. [1301]

Mr. Soames: None. Aircraft proximity incidents reported by military air traffic controllers will continue to be investigated by military authorities. Where an AIRPROX (Controller) report raised by a civil air traffic controller involves military aircraft, the military authorities will assist with the Civil Aviation Authority investigation.

In-flight Dumping

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total amount of aviation fuel lost as a result of in-flight dumping in each financial year since 1990; what was the cost of the loss in each year; and if he will make a statement on measures taken since 1990 to reduce waste by minimising in-flight dumping. [1296]

Mr. Soames: In-flight dumping of fuel takes place only when absolutely necessary for operational or flight safety reasons. Details of the amount and costs of aviation fuel lost as a result of in-flight dumping are not held centrally and this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Military Aircraft Accident Summaries

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on the timing of the publication of military aircraft accident summaries in relation to the timing of inquests or fatal accident inquiries. [1295]

Mr. Soames: Military aircraft accident summaries of aircraft accidents involving fatalities are published by my Department after the next of kin have been notified of the outcome of the board of inquiry. The timing of inquests and fatal accident inquiries is entirely a matter for the coroner or procurator fiscal, as appropriate.

Harrier Aircraft

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the minimum permitted altitude for use of thrust vectoring in forward flight by Harrier aircraft when evading mock interceptions over the United Kingdom. [1285]

Mr. Soames: The use of thrust vectoring up to 30 deg. of nozzle deflection in forward flight is permitted down to approved minimum separation distances within the United Kingdom low flying system when Harrier aircraft are evading mock interceptions. Full nozzle deflection thrust vectoring is permitted above 7,000 ft.

Parachute Regiment

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what disciplinary action was taken in respect of the members of the Parachute Regiment involved in anti-social behaviour on a recent commercial flight to Tenerife; how many personnel were involved; and if he will make a statement. [1815]

Mr. Soames: As a result of this incident, 15 soldiers were placed on a formal warning as to their future conduct.

Ship Sales

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 November, Official Report, column 17, if he will list the dates of construction of each of the vessels currently being sold by his Department. [2250]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is as follows:

Ship name	Laid down
HMS Sirius	9 August 1963
HMS Scylla	17 May 1967
HMS Hermione	6 December 1965
HMS Jupiter	3 October 1966
HMS Redpole	'4 August 1967
HMS Cygnet	'8 July 1976
HMS Kingfisher	'8 October 1975

HMS Upholder	November 1983
HMS Unicorn	February 1989
HMS Unseen	January 1986
HMS Ursula	August 1987
RMAS Pauline Elizabeth	Not recorded

' Dates shown are commissioning dates, as laid down dates are not available for these vessels.

Nigerian Military Personnel

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the number of Nigerian military currently undertaking training in the United Kingdom; and what is the policy of the Government regarding further such training for Nigerian military officers and non-commissioned officers. [2259]

Mr. Soames: There are no members of the Nigerian armed forces currently undertaking training in the United Kingdom. In December 1993, together with our European Union partners, we announced a series of measures applying to Nigeria which included a complete suspension of all military training. Nigerian military personnel undertaking training in the United Kingdom at that time were asked to leave.

Ships and Submarines

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) surface ships and (b) submarines which have been decommissioned but not put up for sale by his Department; and if he will specify what has happened to each of these vessels over the last five years. [2251]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is the Government's policy to put up for sale all vessels, apart from nuclear-powered submarines, that are no longer required by the Royal Navy. The following nuclear submarines have been decommissioned in the last five years and are stored at Rosyth awaiting disposal: Churchill, Conqueror, Courageous, Resolution, Revenge, Swiftsure, Valiant and Warspite.

Skyship 600

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost of his Department's airship, the Skyship 600, Prince of Wales; where it is currently based; what investigation his Department is carrying out into how it burst; what estimate he has made of the total cost of repair to the airship; and if he will make a statement. [2252]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The total procurement cost of the Department's Skyship 600, registered number ZH 762, was approximately £2.6 million and it is based at the Defence Test and Evaluation Organisation site at Boscombe Down. The incident which resulted in rupture of the envelope occurred during a masting operation at Boscombe Down in May 1995 following a day's flying. This was investigated at a formal board of inquiry which concluded human error to be the cause. Repair of the envelope has not been possible; the cost of a replacement has not yet been established.

Former Officers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy in relation to former serving officers of the armed services taking up business appointments in companies which may be bidding for defence contracts. [2253]

Mr. Soames: Former serving officers of the armed forces are required, for a period of two years after leaving Crown service, to apply for official permission before accepting a paid appointment with any organisation with which they had dealings during their last two years of Crown employment.

TRANSPORT

Light Rail Funding

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications for Wythenshawe of Greater Manchester passenger transport authority's strategic development plan; and if he will make a statement of the future of light rail funding with particular reference to the benefits of extending Metrolink. [2112]

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the implications for Manchester, Withington of Greater Manchester passenger transport authority's strategic development plan; [1847]

(2) if he will make a statement on the future of light rail funding. [1848]

Mr. Norris: My Department is aware of Greater Manchester passenger transport authority strategic development plan for public transport which covers the period 1992 to 2002. It is a matter for GMPTA to prioritise the proposals in the plan, which we will then consider in competition with other bids for local transport resources.

Bids for light rail schemes are submitted to my Department during the annual transport policies and programmes round, and are funded through the package approach. I am prepared to consider supporting light rail schemes, including extensions to the Metrolink, provided that they can be demonstrated to be the right and most cost-effective solution to a particular urban transport problem, where they are planned within the context of a strategy or transport package to achieve mode shift away from the private car, and where they will attract significant private sector and local investment. It should be remembered, however, that light rail is not the only solution to urban transport problems, and the difficulties and costs associated with developing schemes should not be underestimated.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the current status of all proposed light rail projects applying for, or seeking (a) construction powers and (b) funding; indicating the percentage levels of funding secured on each project from the private sector. [2256]

Mr. Norris: Two applications for orders under the Transport and Works Act 1992 have been made which relate to light rail projects. These are the Greater Manchester (LRTS) (Airport Extension) and the Greater Manchester (LRTS) (Eccles Extension) Orders. In both cases local inquiries have been held and the Secretary of State is awaiting the inspectors' reports.

My Department has received two applications for funding in 1996–97. These are for the Manchester Metrolink extension to Salford quays and the Leeds supertram. The amount of private sector funding for both these projects has not yet been finalised. Before I agree to fund a new light rail scheme, the promoters must have secured significant private sector and local investment. Each light rail project is different and the level of private sector investment in each scheme will differ.

Metrolink

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the benefits of extending Metrolink. [1849]

Mr. Norris: My Department has received an application from Greater Manchester passenger transport executive for funding under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968 of the Metrolink extension to Salford quays. Subject to final costs and the value of the operating concession, this application appears to meet the criteria that we expect such a scheme to fulfil.

The Department has also received an initial section 56 application for the Metrolink extension to Oldham and Rochdale, although GMPTE has not submitted a bid for funding in 1996–97. GMPTE need to carry out further work on the economic appraisal of this scheme before we can give an indication of whether it meets the relevant criteria.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met Greater Manchester passenger transport authority to discuss Metrolink 2000 and Greater Manchester's plans for an integrated passenger transport network. [1766]

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend visited Manchester to perform a sod-cutting ceremony at Manchester airport on 20 October 1995. While he was there, he received a presentation from Greater Manchester passenger transport authority on its plans to extend the Manchester Metrolink.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received in support of the planned Metrolink extensions; and if he will list them. [2113]

Mr. Norris: My Department has received a small number of letters from the general public and local Members of Parliament in support of the proposed Metrolink extensions, primarily in response to the recent public inquiries into the extensions to Manchester airport and Eccles. We also received 200 objections to the Greater Manchester (LRTS) (Airport Extension) Order.

Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of how many fewer car journeys will be made as a consequence of the opening of the planned Metrolink extension to Eccles via Salford quays. [2088]

Mr. Norris: We have yet to receive an economic appraisal of the extension to Eccles. Greater Manchester passenger transport executive must obtain the necessary powers under the Transport and Works Act 1992 for the extension from Salford quays to Eccles before submitting an application for funding to the Department of Transport. The extension to Salford quays alone is forecast to remove 19 million car trips over the 30-year period of the appraisal.

Crossrail

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the expenditure to date by his Department on the crossrail 2000 scheme. [2149]

Mr. Norris: Expenditure to date on crossrail amounts to some £143 million.

Ferrybridge–Hook Moor Inquiry

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedure in respect of recording of statements, questions and answers was applied during the public inquiry held recently into the A1 Ferrybridge to Hook Moor proposals by the Highways Agency. [2107]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 8 November, Official Report, columns 897–98.

Rail Operators

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to require railway operators to comply with specific passenger loading maxima. [1784]

Mr. Watts: The franchising director will specify load factors or seating capacity requirements in the passenger service requirements where this is necessary to avoid overcrowding on commuter services. The franchising director will set rigorous standards which will regulate the level of crowding on London commuter services below the average experienced in the last 10 years. Where neither load factor regulation nor capacity requirements apply, franchise operators will be required to use all reasonable endeavours to avoid excessive overcrowding on the services they provide.

M1 (Lighting)

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for continous lighting on the remaining unlit sections of theM1 between London and junction 29. [1706]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Sir Irvine Patnick, dated 24 November 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what plans he has for continuous lighting on the remaining unlit sections of the M1 between London and Junction 29.

The M1 is unlit between junctions 19 and 20, 21A and 23, and 26 and 29. There are no plans at present to light these sections but lighting will be considered if it can be economically justified on the bases of forecast savings in night time road accidents.

Motor Vehicle Licensing

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce the results of the consultation exercise on the continuous licensing of motor vehicles. [1791]

Mr. Norris: The consultation exercise on the continuous licensing of motor vehicles ended on 2 June. The responses to the exercise have been very carefully considered and an announcement will be made shortly.

Light Rail Systems

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a list of tram systems currently operating, indicating the number of passengers carried for each where known; if he will make it his policy to promote the development of trams; and if he will make a statement. [1787]

Mr. Norris: There are five principal light rail/tram systems currently operating in England. Details of the schemes and the number of passenger journeys made on each system in 1994–95 are:

	Millions
	1994–95
Blackpool Tramway	5.8
Tyne and Wear Metro	37.2
Docklands Light Railway	11.0
Greater Manchester Metrolink	12.3
South Yorkshire Supertram	2.2

Source:
Transport Statistics Great Britain 1995 and Blackpool Transport Services Ltd.

Inter-urban operations have survived on the Isle of Man with Manx electric railway and the Snaefell mountain railway. A seasonal tramway operates in Llandudno. Construction of the Midland Metro line 1 has begun, and funding has been arranged for the Croydon Tramlink subject to the bids that come forward from the private sector for the concession.

The Government do not have a policy of promoting light rail schemes: local authorities are best placed to develop solutions for the urban transport problems in their town or city. We are prepared to consider supporting light rail schemes that can be demonstrated to be the right and most cost-effective solution to a particular problem, where they are planned within the context of a strategy or transport package to achieve mode shift away from the private car, and where they will attract significant private sector and local investment.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff his Department employs on a regional basis in each standard English region; what is the cost of running these regional operations; what was the total budget for each region in 1994–95; and what are the main purposes for which the budget is used. [262]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 22 November 1995]: My Department employs the following number of staff in the Government offices for the regions:

	Numbers
East Midlands	12
Eastern	10
London	68
North west	12
Northern	21
South west	9
West Midlands	10
Yorkshire and Humberside	4
Total	146

The financial resources required for managing the Government offices are integrated and a separated figure for expenditure on the transport element is not available.

My Department also employs a number of staff in the regions in its executive agencies, its traffic area network and a number of HQ branches. These staff are not employed on a regional basis and a breakdown of each region would be available only at a disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Habitual Residence Test

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants for income support have been subjected to the habitual residence test since its inception. [1829]

Mr. Roger Evans: The habitual residence test has applied to all claimants for income support who have made either a new or repeat claim since 1 August 1994. Figures relating to those claimants who indicated on their claim forms that they entered the United Kingdom within the five years prior to the claim are available in the Library.

Family Credit

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently receiving the £10 weekly allowance with (i) family credit and (ii) disability working allowance for working more than 30 hours a week. [1835]

Mr. Roger Evans: Provisional figures for July 1995 will be available next month. Data for November 1995 will not be available until April 1996.

Income Support

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the latest figures available for people claiming income support (a) by gender, (b) by region, (c) by marital status, (d) with dependants and (e) in total; what were the equivalent figures for 1979; and if he will make a statement. [1082]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables.

Direct comparisons cannot be made between supplementary benefit and income support as their structure and scope differ considerably.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of income support with a disability premium payable on incapacity grounds are currently exempt from the all-work test by virtue of (a) receipt of the highest rate of the disability living allowance care component, (b) in receipt of the premium and aged over 58 years on 13 April 1995, (c) with a serious medical condition and (d) a serious mental illness. [1834]

Mr. Evans: The information requested is not available. Information on the number of income support recipients who qualify to be treated as incapable of work without having to take the all-work test because of receipt of the highest rate of the care component of the disability living allowance will be available at a later date.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families on income support receive (a) the disabled child premium and (b) the lone parent premium; and how many who receive the lone parent premium also receive the disabled premium. [1838]

Mr. Evans: In November 1994, the latest date for which figures are available, 48,000 families on income support had been awarded the disabled child premium, 1,043,000 families had the lone parent premium and 25,000 families had both premiums.

Notes:
All figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.

Income Support Quarterly Enquiry.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently receiving income support urgent cases payment; and how many of these also receive (a) a disability premium and (b) a disabled child premium. [1841]

Mr. Evans: As of November 1994, the latest date for which figures are available, 63,000 claimants were receiving income support urgent case payments. Of these, 2,000 claimants were awarded the disability premium and the number with an award of disabled child premium was negligible.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what how many claimants of income support are working 16 or more hours per week but treated as not in remunerative work because earnings or hours are reduced to 75 per cent. of a non-disabled person. [1756]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people currently in receipt of disability premium payable with (a) income support, (b) housing benefit and (c) council tax are also in receipt of earnings. [1757]

Mr. Evans: The information is set out in the table.

	Recipients
Income support	12,000
Housing benefit	22,000
Council tax benefit	32,000

Notes:

1. Figures refer to the number of benefit units which could be a single person or a couple.
2. Earnings could be declared by either the claimant or their partner.
3. Figures given may include recipients who are in receipt of more than one of the benefits listed.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list the main disabling conditions of people currently in receipt of (a) incapacity benefit and (b) income support with a disability premium; [1750]

(2) if he will list the main disabling conditions of people who have been found capable of work between April and September 1995 who were previously in receipt of (a) incapacity benefit and (b) income support with a disability premium. [1753]

Mr. Evans: Information is not available in the format requested. Of the 800 categories of diagnosis recorded for incapacity claims the 20 most common are:

1. Backache
2. Depression (Unspecified)
3. Osteo Arthritis
4. Arthritis (Unspecified)
5. Ischaemia, of any kind
6. Angina
7. Spondylitis
8. Hypertension
9. Pain, other or unspecified
10. Injury to limb, face, neck, trunk, joint, or shoulder
11. Anxiety State
12. Asthma

Family Benefits

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children were living in families dependent on benefit in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement. [1083]

Mr. Heald: Information prior to 1991 is not available. The information that is available is set out in the table:

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has of the percentage of those in employment but not in an occupational pension scheme who (a) earn more than £10,000 per annum, (b) earn less than £8,000 per annum and (c) earn less than £6,000 per annum. [1843]

Mr. Heald: The information requested is as follows:

Retirement Pensions

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people of pensionable age fail to qualify for a full pension in their own right. [1844]

Mr. Heald: Information on the number of people who have no entitlement to retirement pension is not immediately available. I will let the hon. Member have such information as becomes available as soon as possible.

The available information is in the table.

Retirement Pension in payment in Great Britain at 30 September 1994 to men over 65 and women over 60

Category	All rates	Less than full rate
Cat A men	3,321,170	179,370

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the cost to his Department of paying retirement pension to people (a) who die before their next pay day and (b) whose benefit was due to be reduced for a hospital stay. [1749]

Mr. Heald: Retirement pension is payable for complete weeks only. There is, therefore, no cost if people die before their next pay day and their benefit was due to be reduced as a result of a stay in hospital.

Disability Working Allowance

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of (a) the numbers of new claimants and (b) the cost of reducing the disability working allowance taper from 70 per cent. to (i) 60 per cent., (ii) 50 per cent. and (iii) 30 per cent. [1751]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The estimated effects of changes in the disability working allowance taper are given in the table. The costs are given in 1995–96 prices rounded to the nearest £1 million, and are net of housing benefit and council tax benefit offsets. The numbers of new DWA claimants are rounded to the nearest 1,000.

Disability working allowance	60 per cent. taper	50 per cent. taper	30 per cent. taper

The use of proxy groups means that the estimates are subject to wide margins of error. They will be accurate only to the extent that the proxy groups have the same characteristics as those eligible for DWA.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently in receipt of reduced earnings allowance; how many are aged (a) 39 or under, (b) 40 to 49, (c) 50 to 59, (d) 60 to 65 and (e) 65 to 70 years, by gender; and what is the average amount payable. [1755]

Mr. Roger Evans: Information is not available in the format requested. At 2 April 1994—the latest date for which information is available—there were 142,796 people receiving reduced earnings allowance.

Such information as is available is set out in the table:

Number of reduced earnings allowance assessments current at 2 April 1994 analysed by age and gender

	Males		Females
Age at 31 March 1994	Reduced earnings allowance	Frozen or restricted reduced earnings allowance	Reduced earnings allowance	Frozen or restricted reduced earnings allowance
39 or under	8,342	—	2,501	—
40–49	17,604	—	4,874	—

60–64	17,480	—	3,628	30
65–69	14,992	109	217	2,382

Based on a 10 per cent. sample with an allowance for late returns.

The average rate of reduced earnings allowance at 2 April 1994 was £36.05 and the average rate of frozen or restricted reduced earnings allowance was £24.64.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families on housing benefit receive (a) the disabled child premium and (b) the lone parent premium; and how many who receive the lone parent premium also receive the disabled child premium. [1839]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is set out in the table.

Housing benefit recipients: Great Britain, May 1994

	Numbers of families
(a) Disabled child premium	39,000
(b) Lone parent premium	859,000
(c) Disabled child premium and lone parent premium	21,000

Notes:
1. Figures relate to the number of benefit units which may be a single person or a couple.
2. Families have been defined as single people or couples who have dependants.
3. The figure for (c) is included within the figures given for (a) and (b).

National Insurance

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the benefits on receipt of which people may be credited with class 1 national insurance contributions; how many people were affected by this; and what is the cost to the Exchequer of crediting people with class 1 national insurance contributions by benefit type and in total. [1827]

Mr. Heald: Class 1 national insurance credits may be awarded to people receiving unemployment benefit, incapacity benefit, severe disablement allowance, statutory sick pay, statutory maternity pay, maternity allowance, disability working allowance, invalid care allowance and, where the individual is sick or unemployed, with income support. Credits may also be awarded in cases of sickness and unemployment where no benefit is in payment. Estimates of the cost of credits to the Exchequer are not available. Estimates of the number of benefit recipients in the United Kingdom who were credited with at least one class 1 contribution in the tax year 1992–93 are in the table.

Child Support Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to privatise sections of the Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement. [634]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 23 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about privatisation of parts of the Child Support Agency.

The Agency is currently undertaking a study into the feasibility of having incoming mail opened and sorted during night time hours by Royal Mail. Evaluation of the feasibility study will enable the Agency to determine whether there are significant operational advantages in placing a contract for the delivery of this service in the longer term.

A pilot exercise is running at Falkirk until 31 March 1996. After the exercise, decisions will be taken on whether to contract out the service at Falkirk and whether to extend the operation to other Child Support Agency Centres.

On a wider basis, the services provided by the Child Support Agency will be considered as part of a formal evaluation of the Agency, as is required of all Next Steps Agencies. This is due to be completed by March 1998 and it will include the consideration of all possible options for the best means of delivering the services currently provided by the Agency.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give a breakdown of child support arrears, indicating the initial payment period, and the number of cases with each level of arrears. [635]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 23 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support arrears.

Although information on the number of cases with arrears is available, a breakdown of the amount of arrears in each case could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information on the proportion of arrears that relate to the initial payment period (IPP) is not available. Once IPP maintenance has been rescheduled as arrears it cannot be separately identified.

At 15 September 1995, there were 161,309 cases with arrears. Of these, 89,768 had made at least one payment in the previous 13 weeks, and in the remaining 71,541, no payments had been made.

At the end of September the total maintenance owed to the Agency was £738m. Around 65% of this (£480m) is provisional debt as it relates to interim maintenance assessments. A further 13% (£100m) relates to cases where an agreement has been made with the absent parent as to how and when the maintenance will be paid in the future; these agreements are carefully monitored. It is not possible to say how much of the remaining £158m relates to the initial payment period.

I hope this is helpful.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) in how many cases he has become aware that a Child Support Agency client is a potential suicide risk; and if he will give a month-by-month breakdown for each centre; [636]

(2) what procedures are applied when he becomes aware that a client of the Child Support Agency is a potential suicide risk. [637]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 23 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency's approach to cases where a client "is a suicide risk".

I am sorry that it is not possible to provide an answer to your Questions in the form you have asked, but I will try to address what I think are your main concerns.

Like many other organisations, this Agency is responsible for administering legal and financial responsibilities which are prescribed in legislation, and which may have to be enforced—not least to protect the rights of third parties. Because of the basic nature of our work, we often have to enter people's lives with information that may well add to existing emotional and financial problems.

All staff, particularly those engaged on debt management work, are well trained to deal sensitively with all clients, and to have due regard for the fact some people—whether they are absent parents or parents with care—may well become extremely distressed and even threaten to harm themselves. If they have serious concerns about a particular client, then, following the sort of procedures adopted by organisations with comparable responsibilities, they refer it to a senior, more experienced, manager for their consideration. For example, if a non-compliant absent parent is apparently getting seriously distressed by impending court action, they may check to make doubly sure that all other possibilities have been exhausted, and suspend action on the case for a limited period while this is done. They will decide on how to proceed with all such cases and will control and monitor further action on them.

That manager has no discretion to vary the legally-due amount of maintenance, but they can negotiate the rate of arrears repayments if this offers a possible solution. When managers act in this special role they are not counsellors, nor do they deal solely with cases where there is a suggestion that a client may have threatened to harm themselves: they are simply taking on additional management responsibilities. They act in a supportive manner, but within the framework of ensuring that child maintenance is paid at the required levels to those to whom it is due.

I hope this information is helpful to you.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what assessment his Department has made of the impact on the timetabling of capital projects by existing councils as a result of their being unable to commit more than 70 per cent. of the new unitary budgets for 1995–96; [1183]

(2) when he issued guidance to existing councils in Scotland not to commit more than 70 per cent. of the capital budgets of the new unitary councils in 1995–96; and what considerations underlay the issuing of this guidance; [1184]

(3) what discussions officials of his Department have had with those of the existing regional, district and island councils and shadow councils relating to the impact of his Department's guidance to existing councils not to commit more than 70 per cent. of the capital expenditure of the new unitary councils in the financial year 1995–96; and what the content of these discussions has been. [1185]

Mr. Kynoch: Local authorities' ability to enter into legal commitments in forward years is restricted to a percentage specified in annual capital consent letters. In previous years, authorities have been permitted to enter into forward legal commitments on their non-housing capital programmes of up to 80 per cent. of their provisional capital allocations for the two subsequent years. Non-housing capital consents issued to authorities on 13 March 1995 changed the amount which could be committed in 1996–97 and 1997–98 to 70 per cent. of capital allocations for 1995–96, except in the case of the islands councils where the limit remains at 80 per cent.

The change was made to ensure that existing authorities were able to maintain continuity in their capital programmes without unduly constraining their successors by committing a very high proportion of their likely future resources. This change was discussed and agreed with representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities at a meeting on 14 February 1995.

The forward commitment limit of 70 per cent. for housing capital programmes is unchanged from previous years.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to indicate the budgets and capital budgets of Scotland's new unitary councils. [1182]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend intends to issue non-housing capital consents in late February or early March 1996 and housing capital consents in March 1996. The setting of the revenue budgets for 1996–97 is entirely the responsibility of the councils concerned.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Identity Cards

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has undertaken into the impact identity cards have had on the reduction of crime in European Union countries where they are compulsory; and if he will make a statement. [1528]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Green Paper "Identity Cards" Cm 2879 published in May included information on international experience of identity cards. We have since sought further information on the lessons to be learnt from the use of national identity cards in other European Union countries including any information which may be available in those countries on the impact of identity cards in reducing crime.

Prisons (Discipline)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many concerted acts of indiscipline have taken place at each prison in England and Wales in the current year and in each year since 1990; and if he will make a statement. [448]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Alan Beith, dated 24 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent question about how many concerted acts of indiscipline have taken place at each prison in England and Wales in the current year and in each year since 1990.

Concerted indiscipline takes place when two or more prisoners refuse to conform to the rules and regulations of a prison. Such incidents include both passive disobedience and active indiscipline.

The information requested is provided in the attached table, a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House.

Police Statistics

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) male and (b) female officers there were in each constabulary and at each rank per constabulary in England and Wales in (i) 1979, (ii) 1984, (iii) 1989 and (iv) 1994; and if he will make a statement. [449]

Mr. Maclean: Information for 1994 is provided in table 1. Information for 1979, 1984 and 1989 in the form requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Tables 2, 3 and 4 show police strength by rank for those years. Information on overall proportions of male and female officers in each force is contained in the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, copies of which are in the Library.

Prisoners (Mental Health)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in England, Wales and Scotland received some form of mental health care in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [1527]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter as far as England and Wales are concerned has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given. The provision of information about the position in Scotland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. A. J. Beith, dated 24 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners in England and Wales who have received some form of mental health care in each of the last five years.

This information is not available in the form requested. The Mental Health Act 1983 provides for prisoners who are so mentally disordered as to warrant their detention in a psychiatric hospital for medical treatment to be transferred to such hospitals. The number of such transfers for the years in question is as follows:

Year	Number transferred
1990	337
1991	457
1992	605
1993	767
1994	784

Since December 1991, Prison Service establishments in England and Wales have been carrying out regular medical monitoring exercises. To monitor the assessed needs of mentally disordered prisoners, information is collected centrally on a periodic basis. On a given day prisoners considered by prison doctors to need some form of mental health care are categorised as follows:

(a) prisoners requiring removal or transfer to a psychiatric hospital under Mental Health Act provisions and who are awaiting transfer. This figure included remand prisoners awaiting disposal by the court.

(b) prisoners who were sufficiently ill to be occupying in-patient beds in prison health care centres.

(c) prisoners requiring some form of mental health care but not removal/transfer to psychiatric hospital or in-patient treatment in a prison health care centre.

These single-day surveys can be used to calculate the average number of prisoners requiring transfer to a psychiatric hospital or some other form of mental health care on any one day in the year in question and produce the following figures.

Year	Number of prisoners
1992	2,483
1993	2,694
1994	2,742

Crime Statistics

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) serving police officers, (b) civilian staff assisting the police and (c) crimes there were in the latest available 15 years for each police authority in the United Kingdom; and what was the ratio of crimes to police officers in each case. [1529]

Mr. Maclean: Information about police strength and criminal offences recorded by the police for each force in England and Wales for the last 15 years can be found in the appendix to the annual reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary and in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". Copies of these reports are in the Library.

The table gives the number of notifiable offences, excluding criminal damage valued at £20 and under, recorded per police officer for each force area in England and Wales for the years 1980 to 1994. Figures for Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Probation Service

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will place a copy of his draft replacement to his Department's recruitment brochure for the probation service in the Library; [2297]

(2) when he aims to publish the replacement to his Department's recruitment brochure for the probation service "Facing up to Crime"; and what will be the total cost of the new production; [2296]

(3) if he will list the organisations he is consulting or intends to consult on his replacement for his Department's recruitment brochure for the probation service, together with the closing date for comments; and if he will place copies of all responses in the Library. [2298]

Mr. Kirkhope: An information and recruitment booklet about the work of the probation service to replace "Facing up to Crime" will be published as soon as possible, at a cost of about £45,000. The Association of Chief Officers of Probation, Central Probation Council, Association of Black Probation Officers, National Association of Asian Probation Staff, National Association of Probation Officers, Probation Managers Association and the Society of Chief Officers of Probation have been consulted, with a request to comment by 20 November. We shall place a copy of the new booklet in the Library on publication but do not propose to do so in relation to the consultative draft or the one comment on it so far submitted.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation officers are currently paid from public funds; how many have a qualification in social work; what is the age profile of the probation service; how many probation officers were recruited in 1994; and what was the age profile of these recruits. [1986]

Mr. Kirkhope: The latest available information is as follows:

At 31 March 1995 there were in post 6,041[1] main grade probation officers.

Statistics on the age profile of probation service staff, the numbers holding a social work qualification and the numbers recruited each year are not collected centrally.

[1]Excludes trainee and temporary probation officers.

Nigerian Military Personnel

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the Nigerian military entered the United Kingdom since the execution of Mr. Saro-Wiwa and his colleagues; when they entered the United Kingdom; and for what reasons. [2258]

Mr. Kirkhope: Statistical records are not kept of admissions by reference to occupation. However, since 24 June 1993 visas have been issued to members of the Nigerian military only in exceptional circumstances.

Asylum

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the European Union resolutions, to which he has been a signatory, relating to harmonisation of asylum policy among European Union member states. [1672]

Miss Widdecombe: The following measure relating to the harmonisation of asylum policy has been adopted by the Council in accordance with the procedures established by the intergovernmental chapter—title VI—of the treaty on European Union:

Resolution on minimum guarantees for asylum seekers.

Additionally the following resolutions were adopted by Immigration Ministers under the ad hoc arrangements which existed before the structures created under title VI:

Resolution on a harmonised approach to questions concerning host third countries;

Resolution on manifestly unfounded applications for asylum;

Resolution on certain common guidelines as regards the admission of particularly vulnerable groups from the former Yugoslavia.

Immigration Ministers also agreed the following additional measures:

Convention determining the state responsible for examining applications for asylum lodged in one of the member states of the European Community ("Dublin Convention");

Decision setting up CIREA—Centre of Information Discussion and Exchange on Asylum;

Conclusions concerning countries where there is generally no serious risk of persecution.

Asylum and Immigration

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those countries on the asylum and immigration white list. [1900]

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. and learned Friend informed the House on 20 November, Official Report, column 336, that he will announce at an early stage during the passage of the Asylum and Immigration Bill the likely candidates for inclusion on the list of countries to be designated as not giving rise to a serious risk of persecution.

Prison Service

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the director general of the Prison Service about problems being experienced as a result of the growth in the numbers of prisoners. [1683]

Miss Widdecombe: I have regular discussions with the Director General on a wide range of Prison Service issues, including the prison population.

Illegal Immigrants

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of employers in the United Kingdom who employ illegal immigrants; and what is the basis for this estimate. [1675]

Miss Widdecombe: No such estimates are available.

Extradition

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many British citizens have been extradited to (a) Thailand and (b) the Philippines in each year from 1979 to date, to answer charges relating to sexual activity with juveniles. [1627]

Mr. Kirkhope: There have been no extraditions from the United Kingdom to Thailand or the Philippines since 1979. Statistics regarding the extradition of British citizens are not recorded because there is no bar to extradition of United Kingdom nationals in United Kingdom law.

Prison Staff

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the daily average number of prison staff absent on sick leave, as a total number and as a percentage of the total prison work force. [132]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 24 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking what is the daily average number of prison staff absent on sick leave, as a total number and as a percentage of the total prison workforce.

The information sought is not available centrally in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

During the six months to 30 September 1995, 4.9 per cent. of total shift hours were taken as sick leave by prison officer grades. Over the same period, a total of 31,204 staff weeks were lost due to sick absence (an average of 1200 staff weeks lost per week). There are approximately 24,500 staff in the above mentioned grades.

Prisons (Teachers)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the teaching staff working with prisoners are employed on a part-time basis and how many on a full-time basis; what is the average rate of pay for (a) part-time and (b) full-time teaching staff working with prisoners; and what is the average holiday entitlement for (i) part-time and (ii) full-time teaching staff working with prisoners. [395]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 24 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about how many of the teaching staff working with prisoners are employed on a part-time basis and how many on a full-time basis; what is the average rate of pay for (a) part-time and (b) full-time teaching staff working with prisoners; and what is the average holiday entitlement for (i) part-time and (ii) full-time teaching staff working with prisoners.

The Prison Service does not directly employ any of the teaching staff working in prisons. They are employees of organisations which were awarded contracts for the provision of education services at prison establishments following a competitive tendering exercise. All issues relating to their terms and conditions of employment are matters for their employers, and details of the deployment of teachers are not held centrally. Under the General Terms and Conditions of Contract covering education services, contractors are required to appoint a full-time education co-ordinator to undertake duties for no less than 30 hours a week at each establishment where they hold a contract, so there is at least one full-time teacher at each establishment.

Teaching staff at the contracted out prisons (Blakenhurst, Buckley Hall, Doncaster and Wolds) and at Manchester are employees either of the organisation holding the contract for overall management of the establishment, or of an organisation appointed by the main contractor to manage the education provision. Issues relating to the terms and conditions of employment of these staff are also a matter for the employing organisation rather than the Prison Service.

Prisons (Education)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of Prison Service education facilities is provided by private contractors. [394]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 24 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about what proportion of Prison Service education facilities is provided by private contractors.

There are currently separate contracts for the provision of education services at 123 Prison Service establishments and these are held by 46 different organisations. The great majority of these are colleges of further education, together with one university and three local authority education departments. Four contractors are constituted as private companies. These are Dartington Tech, Direct Training Services Ltd, Mill Wharf Education Services and Secure Education and Training (which is a wholly owned subsidiary of North Oxfordshire College). In addition, two of the four privately-managed prisons have private sector organisations providing the education services.

Private Security Firms

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of private security firms under contract to his Department, indicating whether or not they are members of the industry's self-regulating organisations. [139]

Mr. Howard: The following private security firms are currently employed by my Department:

Armaguard Ltd.
Aviation Security Consultants
Burns International Security Services Ltd.
Care Security Systems Ltd.
Chubb Alarms Ltd.
Defenco Security Services
Group 4 Court Service Ltd.
Group 4 Prison Services Ltd.
Group 4 Securitas (Security Express)

Group 4 Total Security Ltd.
Lisburn Security Services
Maritime Aviation Security Services
Premier Prison Services Ltd.
Reliance Security Service Ltd.
Scrottons Aviation Security
Securicor Custodial Services Ltd.
Securicor Ltd.
Securicor Security Services Ltd.
Securiguard Services Ltd.
Security Ulster Ltd.
Security Wales Ltd.
Sigma Security Ltd.
Shorrock Security Guards Ltd.
UK detention Services Ltd.

Information about the self-regulating organisations to which these security firms belong is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Terrorists

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those convicted terrorists who will be released from Ulster's jails before Christmas as a result of changes in remission rules, indicating the crime they were convicted of and the length of sentence imposed. [64]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Northern Ireland Prison Service under its chief executive, Mr. Alan Shannon. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. D. Shannon to Rev. Ian Paisley, dated 23 November 1995.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to this Parliamentary Question in which you asked for a list of convicted terrorists who will be released before Christmas as a result of changes in remission rules.

It remains our policy not to divulge information about individual prisoners and their crimes but I can advise you that it is anticipated that 94 prisoners who were convicted of scheduled offences will be released on licence before Christmas 1995 as a result of the changes in remission rules brought in by the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentence) Act 1995.

I hope this information is helpful.

Belfast Institute of Further and Higher Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what proposals he has to improve the quality of the buildings in the Belfast institute of further and higher education; [1111]

(2) when the Belfast Institute of further and higher education commissioned an economic appraisal to address the institute's most pressing accommodation needs in accordance with his request; what were its findings, and what action has been taken. [1112]

Mr. Ancram: The Belfast education and library board completed a major review of the institute's accommodation needs in 1991 which produced a preferred option of a new building on a new site at a cost of some £70 million. Because of the magnitude of this proposal, the board was asked to examine how the accommodation needs could be provided on a phased basis. An economic appraisal to address the most pressing accommodation needs is currently being prepared by the board and is expected to be completed by the end of the year.

Health Spending

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will itemise how much (a) NHS trusts, (b) general practitioner fundholders, (c) regional health authorities and (d) district health authorities spent on health care from non-NHS providers in each year since 1991–92 in each region. [2416]

Mr. Moss: In Northern Ireland integrated health and personal social services are supplied by health boards, health and social services trusts and general practitioner fundholders.

Expenditure by health and social services boards on purchase of health and social services from non-NHS/HPSS providers was as follows:

	NHSSB £	SHSSB £	EHSSB £	WHSSB £
1992–93	377,056	159,871	4,876,322	364,100
1993–94	279,013	172,350	3,177,081	820,278
1994–95	65,190	631,752	2,693,070	1,143,911

The accounts of health and social services boards were revised in 1992–93 to take account of the separation of the purchaser/provider functions. Consequently, the information in the table on expenditure is not available prior to this date.

The first six health and social services trusts in Northern Ireland were established with effect from 1 April 1993, a further seven trusts were established with effect from 1 April 1994. The accounts of the trusts, within each board area, indicated expenditure on purchases from non-NHS/HPSS providers as follows:

	1993–94 £	1994–95 £
Northern area	Nil	Nil
Southern area	Nil	4,048
Eastern area	Nil	36,509
Western area	Nil	Nil

General practitioner fundholders' expenditure on the purchase of health and personal social services from non-NHS/HPSS providers was as follows:

	1994–95 £
Northern area	86,518
Southern area	1,067
Eastern area	165,510
Western area	67,769

Prior to 1994–95 the accounts of general practitioner fundholders did not separately record expenditure on purchases from non-NHS/HPSS providers. Consequently, the information in the table on purchase is not available prior to this date.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Spiro Family

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ask the consul general in Los Angeles if he might be prepared to interview Mr. Alain and Mr. Arthur Ivy on the question of what knowledge they have as to the circumstances surrounding the death of the Spiro family. [2073]

Mr. Hanley: It is for the United States police authorities to conduct any interviews relevant to the incident.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the consul general in Los Angeles has, within the last eight weeks, asked the San Diego county sheriff when he intends to release the medical examiners' report into the circumstances surrounding the death of the Spiro family in the United States of America. [2072]

Mr. Hanley: Consular officials in Los Angeles requested copies of the police and autopsy reports on 19 October following the conclusion of police investigations. We expect them in the next few weeks.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's current policy on the sale of military equipment to Sri Lanka; when the latest embargo was lifted; and what considerations underlay this action. [2070]

Mr. Hanley: We maintain strict controls on all exports of military equipment to Sri Lanka. We examine each case on its merits, paying particular attention to the Sri Lankan Government's human rights record. A total embargo on arms sales to Sri Lanka was lifted in October 1992, following evidence that the Sri Lankan Government had improved their human rights record.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ban the sale of arms to Sri Lanka. [2051]

Mr. Hanley: We maintain strict controls on all exports of military equipment to Sri Lanka. We examine each case on its merits, paying particular attention to the Sri Lankan Government's human rights record, and bearing in mind their right to defend themselves against military attack.

Iraq

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how evidence of wrongdoing referred to in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 551, will be investigated in the absence of information on export licences granted prior to 1987 at the Department of Trade and Industry; and what are the specific criteria against which wrongdoing is assessed in this investigation; [1982]

(2) which body will undertake the investigation referred to in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 551; and what is the estimated date for completion of the investigation; [1981]

(3) when the United Nations Special Commission referred information, which was referred to in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 551, to the British Government; and what it expected the British Government to do with that information; [1983]

(4) over what period and in which goods the British companies mentioned in the UNSCOM evidence, referred to in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 551, were trading with Iraq; [1984]

(5) if the information provided by the United Nations Special Commission in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 551, is being investigated at present. [1980]

Mr. David Davis: I refer the hon. Member to my letters of 24 July and 25 September and to my replies of 27 October, Official Report, column 862, and 6 November, Official Report, column 551.

I also refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 21 November, Official Report, column 68.

I have nothing further to add to previous answers to questions on this subject.

Nepal

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to press for the release of 11 Christians imprisoned in Nepal for proselytism. [1994]

Mr. Hanley: Our ambassador in Katmandu raised the case of the 11 Christians with the Nepalese authorities on 24 August. All 11 were released on 9 November.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to encourage constructive action by the Governments of Nepal and India on the problem of the trafficking of women and children from Nepal to India for the purpose of prostitution. [1995]

Mr. Hanley: We share international concern about this matter. We are working through our aid programme, and through liaison with the Nepalese authorities and non-governmental organisations, to help combat the trafficking of young Nepalese women.

Nigerian Military Personnel

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy towards the granting of visas for Nigerian military personnel. [2257]

Mr. Hanley: Since 24 June 1993 it has been Government policy not, except in the most exceptional circumstances, to issue visas to Nigerian military or security personnel or their families. In line with an EU resolution adopted on 20 November this year, this policy has now been extended to Nigerian civilian Ministers and their families. Although visas that have already been issued cannot be cancelled, we have arranged for entry to the United Kingdom to be denied to those who hold valid multiple entry visas.

PRIME MINISTER

Computers

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the implications of the decision to exclude the British company Meiko from the shortlist to provide computers for the Ministry of Defence on Britain's technology base. [1565]

Mr. Page: I have been asked to reply.

The Department of Trade and Industry has made no such assessment.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Playing Fields

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of how many school playing fields are under threat of development in England. [1558]

Mrs. Gillan: The latest information available comes from the Sports Council's register of recreational land, which at present hold records for around 80 per cent. of all playing fields in England.

According to the register, of the 42,690 school playing fields in England, 850 are subject to existing planning permission or to a pending planning decision.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her estimate of the number of school playing fields that have been sold in England since 1981. [1557]

Mrs. Gillan: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 19 October 1995, Official Report, column 376.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans her Department has to increase the statutory minimum areas of school playing fields. [1468]

Mrs. Gillan: None.

School Computers

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average number of computers (a) per school and (b) per pupil in the Sheffield, Yorkshire and Humberside areas; and if she will make a statement. [1708]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is not available.

School Governors (Training)

Sir Irvine Patnick: to ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what training courses for school governors are the statutory responsibilities of local education authorities; how many courses Sheffield education authority has held in the last five years; and if she will make a statement. [1707]

Mr. Robin Squire: Each local education authority must by law make available free of charge to the governors of its schools any training it considers necessary for them to discharge their functions effectively. It is for each LEA to judge what is necessary. But most LEAs, including Sheffield, have appointed governor training co-ordinators to secure the availability of suitable training programmes. Figures on the number of training courses provided by LEAs are not held centrally. But since April 1992 Sheffield has offered governing bodies the opportunity to buy into an annual scheme including various forms of support and training.

In 1993–94 Sheffield provided 189 training events; in 1994–95, 158; and for the current year an anticipated total of 184.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to review the financial assessment regulation in respect of the assisted places scheme. [2228]

Mrs. Gillan: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) on 23 November 1995, Official Report, columns 323-24.

Restart Courses

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the number of participants for restart courses; what the scheme cost, what the planned expenditure was; and what number of those on the scheme achieved positive outcomes, and the breakdown of those outcomes in terms of numbers moving into (a) full-time education, (b) full-time employment, (c) part-time employment and (d) other outcomes for each year since 1991. [1764]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. David Blunkett, dated 24 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about Restart Courses.

It may help if I explain that Restart Courses have been in existence since 1986. In April 1994 a new two week Restart Course programme was launched. The new course combines formal morning attendance with individual job search activities in the afternoon. New Restart Courses were developed on the success of the original shorter one week courses and are designed to boost confidence and job search activity. There is an emphasis on making real applications for jobs and opportunities. They give people an opportunity to take a fresh look at their situation, become aware of the options open to them locally and plan positive steps back to work. During the course each person produces a plan of the steps they need to take to help them back to work.

The attached table gives the number of participants who have attended the courses since 1991 and the cost and planned expenditure for each year. The table and explanatory notes also contain information on positive outcomes.

I hope this is helpful.

[4] Other outcomes include starts on TFW, Jobclub, Community Action, JIG, Worktrials, JRW, jss, Career Development Loans, PDF, Further Education, Other e.g. Princes Trust voluntary work. Information on starts on other outcomes was not collected until April 1995. Separate information on participants entering full-time education is not routinely collected.
[5] This information was not routinely collected until April 1994.

Training

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each year since 1994 in respect of (a) workwise/worklink and 1-2-1 and (b) modern apprenticeships (i) the number of participants, (ii) the scheme cost, (iii) the planned expenditure, (iv) the number of those on the scheme who achieved positive outcomes, and the breakdown of the positive outcomes in terms of numbers going into (1) full-time education, (2) full-time employment, (3) part-time employment and (4) other outcomes. [1842]

Mr. Forth: The figures requested are shown in the following tables:

1-2-1 (pilot)	7,533	£0.5 million	5,109	[2]n/a	[3]866	n/a	[4]4,243

[1] Separate information on types of positive outcome were not collected during the pilot stage.
[2] Numbers into full-time education included in 'Other Outcomes'.
[3] Includes full and part-time employment.
[4] Other outcomes includes Business Start-Up starts; Training for Work starts; Community Action starts; Family Credit starts; other sign offs; Jobclub starts; Job Interview Guarantee (JIG) starts; Work Trial starts.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each year since 1993 in respect of (a) community action, (b) workstart and (c) training for work, (i) the number of participants, (ii) what the scheme cost, (iii) what the planned expenditure was, (iv) what number of those on the scheme achieved positive outcomes and (v) the break-down of the outcomes in terms of the numbers going into (1) full-time education, (2) full-time employment, (3) part-time employment and (4) other outcomes. [1758]

Mr. Forth: The information requested is contained in the following three tables:

Table 1

Community action	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Number of participants[1]	23,389	47,646	21,932 (to October)
Cost of scheme[2]	£14.4 million	£98.5 million	£44,947,987 (to October)
Planned expenditure	£31.4 million	£100 million	£70 million
Outcomes into full-time education[3]	2.8 per cent.	3.8 per cent.	—
Outcomes into full-time employment[3]	12.7 per cent.	9.4 per cent.	—
Outcomes into part-time employment[3]	4.1 per cent.	4.4 per cent.	—
Other outcomes[3], [4]	6.5 per cent.	9.3 per cent.	—
Total positive outcomes[3]	26.1 per cent.	26.9 per cent.	—

Notes:
[1] This is the number of people who started on Community Action in each year.
[2] Community Action began in July 1993 and the underspend in 1993–94 was due to a less rapid build up than was anticipated.
[3] Outcomes are measured by postal follow up of all participants 3 months after leaving the programme. As this is a survey the figures are represented as percentages, no actual numbers are available. The latest available data are up to the end of March 1995.
[4] Other positive outcomes are self-employment and participation in Government training schemes.

Table 2

Workstart	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Numbers into employment	1,099	476	—
Cost of scheme	£0.28 million	£1.87 million	—
Planned expenditure	£1.14 million	£2.45 million	£0.53 million

1) Workstart subsidies are paid to employers who recruit the ES's very long term unemployed clients. All clients enter jobs which involve working 16 hours or more per week and are expected to last at least the length of the subsidy period.
2) For Workstart pilots ran from June 1993 to December 1994. The subsidy was paid over a 12 month period and so some participating employers are still receiving payments. As payments cease if a subsidised employee leaves, the total 1995–96 expenditure will not be known until February 1996.
3) Two new Workstart pilots began in April this year. They have a combined budget of £5.89 million for 1995–96. As in the first pilots the exact amount to be spent will depend upon people remaining in work for the duration of the subsidy set. To date (10 November) there have been 482 starts on this pilot.

Total positive outcomes[2]	43 per cent.	42 per cent.	—

Notes:
[1] The final outturn information for 1994–95 will not be available until late autumn when the Department's Appropriation Accounts are finalised.
[2] Information on positive outcomes comes from the TFW National Follow up Surveys and it is only possible to give percentages and not actual numbers. The latest available information is up to January 1995. Over the period covered by the table it is only possible to give a consistent series for England and Wales.
[3] Other outcomes are self-employment or another Government training programme.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each year since 1991 for (a) job review workshops, (b) job clubs, (c) travel to interview, (d) youth training credits, (e) career development loans, and (f) job search seminars (i) the number of participants, (ii) what the scheme cost, (iii) what the planned expenditure was, (iv) what number of those on the scheme achieved positive outcomes, and (v) the breakdown of the positive outcomes in terms of the numbers going into (1) full-time education, (2) full-time employment, (3) part-time employment and (4) other outcomes. [1759]

Mr. Forth: The information requested is contained in the following tables:

Table 1: Job review workshops

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	April–October 1995
Number of participants	15,358	41,915	37,293	33,821	18,266
Cost of scheme (cash prices £ million)[1]	1.3	3.8	3.4	2.6	1.3
Planned expenditure (£ million)[2]	n/a	n/a	n/a	3.8	3.2
Outcomes into employment[3]	—	—	—	—	—
Other outcomes[3]	—	—	—	—	—
Total positive outcomes[3]	—	—	—	—	—

[1] Total expenditure for the year.
[2] (i) The Government updates its expenditure plans annually and these are published in March in the Departmental Report. These figures are subject to change during the year. "n/a" equates to figures which are not published in the Departmental Report and are therefore not available.
(ii) The figure for April to October 1995 is an estimate for the total operational year and may be subject to change.
[3] Job review workshops are targeted mainly at unemployed professional and executive people and help individuals identify transferable skills so that they are able to consider a wider range of occupations. Information about outcomes which participants may enter during or following the two day workshop is not therefore routinely collected. Outcomes into employment is not therefore available.
1. Other outcomes are not collected for this programme (see above).
2. Total positive outcomes are not collected for this programme (see above).

Table 2: Jobclub

Total positive outcomes	102,913	127,878	135,670	143,617	75,911

[1] Total expenditure for the year.
[2] (i) The Government updates its expenditure plans annually and these are published in March in the Departmental Report. These figures are subject to change during the year. "n/a" equates to figures which are not published in the Departmental Report and are therefore not available.
(ii) The figure for April to October 1995 is an estimate for the total operational year and may be subject to change.
[3] Total outcomes into employment include full and part-time jobs. Separate figures are not routinely collected. Outcomes are only recorded if they occur during Jobclub membership and can be directly attributed to the programme.
[4] Other outcomes include Government training programmes and other training or employment related opportunities, including further education and self-employment.

Table 3: Travel to interview scheme

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	April–October 1995

Other outcomes[5]	—	—	—	—	—
Total positive outcomes[6]	n/a	n/a	5,801	6,762	3,121

[1] To September.
[2] Total expenditure for the year.
[3] (i) The Government updates its expenditure plans annually and these are published in March in the Departmental Report. These figures are subject to change during the year. "n/a" equates to figures which are not published in the Departmental Report and are therefore not available.
(ii) The figure for April to October 1995 is an estimate for the total operational year and may be subject to change.
[4] Information about outcomes into employment was not collected prior to 1993–94.
[5] Since the scheme is targeted only at those gaining job interviews and subsequently jobs, information about other outcomes is not collected. The numbers obtaining a job as a result of an interview where fares to the interview are funded by this scheme are recorded.
[6] Total positive outcomes are jobs entries only (see (4) above).

Table 4: Youth Training Credits

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	April–October 1995
Number of participants[1]	286,000	282,100	283,600	273,200	270,600
Cost of scheme (cash prices £ million)[2]	n/a	60.9	111.6	149.4	n/a

Outcomes into employment (per cent.)[4]	46(4)	44(5)	47(5)	50(5)	—
Other outcomes (per cent.)[5]	17	17	18	16	—
Total positive outcomes (per cent.)[6]	67	67	70	72	—

[1] The figures shown are the total number of people participating in Youth Training since the number of people taking Youth Training Credits is not separately available.
[2] (i) For 1991–92 separate data was not collected for this programme.
(ii) For 1994–95 the figure shown is provisional and may be subject to change.
(iii) For 1995–96 Youth Training Credits now work, not as a separate programme as in previous years, but as an access mechanism to training. Outturn figures will not be available until after the end of this financial year.
[3] (i) Planned expenditure on Youth Training credits in 1993–94 and subsequently is included as part of the overall planned expenditure on Youth Training and cannot be separately identified. In 1991–92 and 1992–93 actual figures for Youth Training Credits are shown. For comparative purposes the total planned expenditure on Youth Training, which included Youth Training Credits, was £741 million and £705 million respectively.
(ii) In 1994–95 planned expenditure included spending by TECs on careers advice and guidance and the development of the youth credits scheme.
(iii) In 1995–96 planned expenditure includes provision for Modern Apprenticeships which was introduced nationally in September 1995.
[4] (i) As outcome information is estimated from survey data it is not possible to give actual numbers. The information given is on the basis of percentage outcome estimates from surveys conducted six months after a participant leaves the programme.
(ii) The latest available information is for the period April 1994 to January 1995 and is for England and Wales only.
(iii) The percentage of people entering full-time employment is shown. The figures in brackets shows the additional percentage of participants entering part-time employment.
[5] Other Outcomes include entry into other Government programmes and self-employment.
[6] This is the percentage of participants who entered jobs, further training, self-employment and full-time education.

Total positive outcomes[6]	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a

[1] Total number of participants are shown as the number of loans approved in year.
[2] Total expenditure in the year.
[3] (i) The Government updates its expenditure plans annually and these are published in March in the Departmental Report. The figures provided are the Supply Estimate for each year and may, due to minor adjustments between the PES settlement and publication of the Estimate, differ slightly from the planned figure published in the Departmental Report.
(ii) The figure for April to October 1995 is an estimate for the total operational year and may be subject to change.
[4] Total job entries include full and part-time jobs. Separate figures are not routinely collected. As outcome information is estimated from survey data it is not possible to give actual numbers. The information given is on the basis of percentage outcome estimates from surveys conducted three months after a participant leaves the programme.
[5] For this programme the only other outcome recorded is the number of clients going into further training. This is expressed as a percentage (see (4) above).
[6] Since only percentage figures are available for those entering outcomes a total number of participants entering positive outcomes is not available.

Table 6: Job Search Seminar

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	April–October 1995

Other outcomes[4]	—	—	—	—	—
Total positive outcomes[5]	—	—	—	—	—

[1] Total expenditure for the year.
[2] (i) The Government updates its expenditure plans annually and these are published in March in the Departmental Report. These figures are subject to change during the year. "n/a" equates to figures which are not published in the Departmental Report and are therefore not available.
(ii) The figure for April to October 1995 is an estimate for the total operational year and may be subject to change.
[3] Total job entries include full and part-time jobs. Separate figures are not routinely collected. Only those job outcomes achieved during the five week period of the seminar are recorded are shown above.
[4] The main focus of this programme is to provide advice on job search and to increase job search activity with the aim of helping participants find employment. Entry into outcomes other than employment is not therefore routinely collected.
[5] Total positive outcomes are for job entries only [see (4) above].

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in how many cases she has required governors to modify proposals for grant-maintained status. [1760]

Mr. Robin Squire: Some 650 proposals for grant-maintained status have been approved with modifications. These include changes to the implementation date, the admissions arrangements and the membership of the governing body.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each of the last two years the date of each ballot result on grant-maintained status and the date of publication of each set of proposals. [1761]

Job Finder's Grant

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the number of persons benefiting from job finder's grant; what the scheme cost; and what the planned expenditure was for each year since 1994. [1762]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. David Blunkett, dated 24 November 1995.

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the Jobfinder's Grant.

I attach a table showing how many people have been awarded Jobfinder's Grants nationally and by Employment Service region.

The figures shown cover the period 7 February 1994 to 31 December 1994 when the scheme was being piloted in the Midlands and from 18 April 1995 when the programme was introduced nationally (22 May in Yorkshire and Humberside region, where a more flexible variant to the programme is being piloted) up to 3 November, the latest date for which figures are available.

Last year's pilot cost £800,000. Planned expenditure in 1995/96 is £5 million.

I hope this is helpful.

Jobmatch Scheme

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the number of persons benefiting from the jobmatch scheme; what the scheme cost; and what the planned expenditure was for 1995. [1763]

Mr. Forth: The fullest information available, covering the period 3 April to 30 September 1995, shows that 989 people had benefited from jobmatch at a total programme cost of £497,000. The overall planned expenditure for the 1995–96 financial year was £5 million.

Job Interview Guarantee

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the number of participants for the job interview guarantee; what the scheme cost; what the planned expenditure was; what number of those on the scheme achieved placings; and what was the breakdown of the placings in terms of the numbers going into (a) full-time employment and (b) part-time employment. [1765]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. David Blunkett, dated 24 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about Job Interview Guarantee (JIG).

During the year 1994/95, the number of people assisted by JIG was 450,138. Actual expenditure was £22,367,851, compared with planned expenditure of £23,767,851.

The number of those assisted who were placed into a job was 205,020. As JIG is particularly aimed at long term unemployed people, you might be interested to know that 165,535 of those placed had been out of work for six months or more. I am afraid no statistics are held which differentiate between full and part time employment.

I hope this is helpful.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many of the people disallowed invalidity benefit following the all-work test between April and September 1995 made a claim to unemployment benefit and (a) received unemployment benefit only, (b) received unemployment benefit and income support, (c) received income support only, (d) received credits only and (e) were not entitled; how many were signing on pending an appeal against disallowance of incapacity benefit; and how many were referred to the placing, assessment and counselling teams. [1837]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Keith Bradley, dated 24 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about how many of the people disallowed Incapacity Benefit (IB) following the All Work Test between April and September 1995, made a claim to unemployment benefit and about the outcome of those claims.

In the period April to September 1995, 8,974 people disallowed IB following the All Work Test made a claim to unemployment benefits. Of these, 34 had their claims disallowed because they did not meet the conditions for receiving such benefits by being available for and actively seeking work. Information is not collected centrally about the nature of the benefit received by the remainder. Also we do not keep records of the number of people who while making a claim for unemployment benefits are also making an appeal against the decision of the Benefits Agency adjudication officer to disallow IB. This is because such appeals have no effect on a claim to unemployment benefits.

During the same period, 2624 people who had been disallowed IB were referred to our Placing, Assessment and Counselling Teams for specialist assessment and help.

I hope this is helpful.

Job Vacancies

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list, for the latest month for which figures are available and for the equivalent month in 1990, the number of job vacancies advertised in jobcentres which were (a) part-time and (b) temporary in character; and what proportion of total vacancies advertised each represented. [2423]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Michael Meacher, dated 24 November 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about part time and temporary vacancies in Jobcentres.

The information is recorded on a quarterly basis, rather than monthly as you requested. Details for the latest quarter, and the equivalent period in 1990 are as follows:

10 July 1995–6 October 1995

	Number
(a) Total number of vacancies notified	697,693
(b) of which were part time	202,561
(c) percentage of total vacancies	29
(d) of which were temporary	162.025
(e) percentage of total vacancies	23.2

9 July 1990 to 5 October 1990

	Number
(a) Total vacancies notified	622,768
(b) of which were part time	184,312
(c) percentage of total vacancies	29.6
(d) of which were temporary	108,031
(e) percentage of total vacancies	17.3

I hope this is helpful.

Remploy

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the calculation of flow back shown in the Remploy annual accounts as the net cost to the Treasury; what is the detailed basis for the calculations; and if she will publish the calculations for the average flow back per Remploy disabled employee for each of the last five years. [2255]

Mr. Paice: The figures are Remploy's own and no assessment has been made of the results or the basis for the calculations.

Labour Statistics, West Yorkshire

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the total number of (a) full-time and part-time permanent positions and (b) full-time and part-time temporary positions in the West Yorkshire region, including a breakdown of occupations. [1446]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

The estimates available from the labour force survey are shown in the table following:

Employees in West Yorkshire, by occupation Spring 1995

Incomes

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what percentage of workers on adult rates currently earn less than (a) £2.50, (b) £3, (c) £3.50, (d) £4, (e) £4.50, (f) £5, (g) £5.50 and (h) £6.50, per hour including and excluding overtime, in (i) Yorkshire and Humberside, (ii) north Yorkshire, (iii) the north and (iv) the United Kingdom, distinguishing between manual and non-manual, male and female and part-time workers; [1462]

(2) what percentage of full-time workers on adult rates currently earn less than (a) £100, (b) £150, (c) £200 and (d) £250 per week, including and excluding overtime, in (i) Yorkshire and Humberside, (ii) north Yorkshire, (iii) west Yorkshire, (iv) south Yorkshire, (v) Humberside, (vi) the north of England and (vii) the United Kingdom. [1458]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

Information available from the new earnings survey is provided in the tables.

WALES

Cryptosporidium

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the recorded number of cases of cryptosporidium in each health authority and in Wales as a whole for the last two years for which information is available; and if he will make a statement. [548]

Mr. Richards: The number of cases of cryptosporidium is not available. However, the numbers of finished consultant episodes recorded for Welsh residents by hospitals in Wales, where the condition was the principal diagnosis, are given in the following table:

Area of residence	1992–93	1994–95
Clwyd	4	3
Gwent	0	3
Gwynedd	0	1
Mid Glamorgan	5	5
Powys	1	0
South Glamorgan	2	7
West Glamorgan	0	1
Pembrokeshire	1	3
East Dyfed	1	0

Breast Cancer

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research he has initiated to examine the causes of the breast cancer rates in Wales in respect of (a) East Dyfed and (b) Gwynedd. [1149]

Mr. Richards: Research has identified a number of factors which are consistently related to the development of breast cancer, and it is unlikely that breast cancer rates in Gwynedd and East Dyfed are being influenced by some new factor that has not been detected in previous studies. For this reason we do not consider that research into the incidence of breast cancer in individual regions or countries would be of benefit in terms of the treatment or prevention of this disease.

School Budgets

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of the potential schools budget delegated to schools through the aggregate schools budget in each local education authority for each year for which information is available. [1421]

Mr. Richards: Welsh Office circular 38/91 on local management of schools, published in July 1991, proposed that a minimum of 85 per cent. of a local education authority's potential schools budget should be delegated to schools and that all LEAs would be expected to comply with this requirement by 1 April 1993. The following table shows the levels of delegation since then.

PQ 35/95/96: Percentage of PSB delegated to ASB by LEA

Percentage

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Clwyd	86.3	85.0	85.1
Dyfed	84.5	85.2	85.0
Gwent	84.8	85.0	85.6
Gwynedd	85.6	87.5	88.0
Mid Glamorgan	86.2	87.4	87.8
Powys	92.0	90.0	89.2
South Glamorgan	87.6	87.1	87.7
West Glamorgan	88.0	88.2	89.2
Wales	86.4	86.6	87.0

Note:
The details for 1993–94 are taken from Section 42 outturn statements provided by LEAs; the 1994–95 and 1995–96 details from Section 42 budget statements.

Health Services (Rationing)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the health authorities in Wales which are rationing (a) ear grommets, (b) dilatation and curettage for women under 40 years, (c) varicose vein surgery, (d) screening for osteoporosis, (e) fertility treatment, (f) screening for aortic aneurysm and (g) screening for colon and rectum cancers. [1639]

Mr. Hague: None. Decisions on the appropriateness of a particular treatment are a matter for clinical judgment.

Welsh Language (Cardiff Airport)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will discuss with the management of Cardiff international airport measures to improve the use of the Welsh language on signs within the airport precinct; and if he will make a statement. [2052]

Mr. Hague: No. This is entirely a matter for TBI, the owner of Cardiff international airport, which I understand is in contact with the Welsh Language Board.

Welsh Islands Conference

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the conference on Welsh islands organised by the Countryside Council for Wales on 15 November. [1813]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The two-day conference brought together for the first time nearly 100 delegates who are involved in managing Welsh islands. A note of the proceedings will be provided by the Countryside Council for Wales in due course.

I understand that the event was considered to have been successful.

Non-NHS Providers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will itemise how much (a) NHS trusts, (b) general practitioner fundholders, (c) regional health authorities and (d) district health authorities spent on health care from non-NHS providers in each year since 1991–92 in each region. [2414]

Mr. Richards: The information is as follows:

£ thousands

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
NHS trusts	n/a	nil	2,688	2,492
GP Fundholders	11	113	657	1,290
District health authorities	4,384	8,078	11,261	14,309

Notes:

1. Information is not held centrally in respect of individual GP fundholding practices but their expenditure is shown on an aggregated basis in the annual accounts of the Family Health Services Authorities which pay for healthcare purchases on their behalf.
2. There are no regional authorities in Wales.
3. The first NHS trust in Wales, Pembrokeshire NHS Trust was established on 1 April 1992. A further 13 and 10 became operational in 1993–94 and 1994–95 respectively.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the outturn figures for regional selective assistance (a) offers and (b) payments for 1994–95; and if he will indicate how these figures related to the original budgeted plans for that year. [2110]

Mr. Hague: The information requested is available in the most recent Welsh Office departmental report, Cm 2815, and Industrial Development Act 1982 annual report, Cm 723. Copies of these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Temporary Traffic Lights

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales where are the longest serving temporary traffic lights on the trunk roads for which he is responsible, how long they have been in use and what has been the total cost so far. [2150]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The longest serving temporary traffic lights are located on the A494 trunk road at Drws y Nant Bala. They have been in use for 16 years. The current annual cost of retaining the lights is approximately £1,800.

North East Wales Institute of Higher Education

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to receive the accounts of the North East Wales institute; and when they will become publicly available. [2151]

Mr. Richards: The annual audited accounts of the North East Wales institute of higher education are expected to be submitted to the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales on 31 December 1995 and will become publicly available from that date.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Debt Write-offs

Mr. Robathan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made on the implementation of Naples terms by the Paris Club; and if he will make a statement about how debts forgiven or abandoned are to be treated in the trading accounts of the Export Credits Guarantee Department. [3070]

Mr. Nelson: In December 1994 the Paris Club—representing leading creditor Governments—agreed to implement write-offs of up to 67 per cent. of official bilateral debt owned by the world's poorest, most indebted countries. This agreement—known as Naples terms—represented the culmination of very substantial efforts by the UK, beginning with the Prime Minister's announcement of his Trinidad terms initiative in 1990, to reduce the debt service obligations of the world's poorest countries to manageable levels. Official creditors have been implementing Naples terms since the beginning of the year. So far 10 countries have had agreements from the Paris Club incorporating debt reduction up to 67 per cent; one of these—Uganda—has been given debt reduction in respect of all its eligible debt to official Paris Club creditors.

In order to put ECGD's trading accounts on to a more realistic footing, the amounts shown in the accounts as owing to the Consolidated Fund, in respect of account 1, will be reduced in line with the extent that debts are forgiven or abandoned; this will apply to both debt forgiveness under Paris Club arrangements, including debt forgiveness for Poland and Egypt, and debts on which recovery is to be abandoned because their further pursuit is no longer justified on grounds of value for money. This has resulted in a reduction of £1,030 million in the balance owed to the Consolidated Fund as at 31 March 1995. Further details are given in ECGD's 1994–95 annual report and trading accounts which are being published on 30 November.

Research Institutes

Mr. Robathan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about forthcoming prior options reviews of institutes sponsored by the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council. [3071]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government announced on 29 September 1995 that all public sector research establishments would be subject to prior options reviews.

The BBSRC's arrangements for sponsoring the Institute of Grassland and Environmental Research, Institute of Arable Crops Research, Silsoe Research Institute and the John Innes Centre will be reviewed immediately. Other research council research establishments will be reviewed in the course of 1996.

These reviews will take place alongside those of establishments parented or sponsored by other Government Departments which are carrying out work in similar or related fields. The reviews will build on any relevant recent studies.

I should welcome comments from interested parties. Comments should be sent by 8 January 1996 to:

Dr. M. Anderson, BBSRC, Polaris House, North Star Avenue, Swindon, SN2 1UH in respect of the IACR and SRI, and to Dr. Vincent Essex at the same address in respect of IGER and the JIC.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many jobs have been lost in the aerospace industry in each year since 1980; and what are the equivalent statistics for (a) France, (b) Germany and (c) Italy. [1010]

Mr. Eggar: The figures requested are given in the table:

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the level of output of the aerospace industry for each of the years since 1989 in (a) real terms and (b) as a percentage of GDP; and what are the equivalent figures for (a) France, (b) Germany and (c) Italy. [1012]

Mr. Eggar: The figures requested are given in the table:

Invoices (Late Payments)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how many (i) orders and (ii) firms are represented by the 16 per cent. of invoices not paid by his Department within 30 days or in accordance with contractual agreements in 1994–95; and how many of these are related to firms with fewer than 500 employees; [913]

(2) what is the amount owed to those businesses whose invoices were not paid within 30 days or within the agreed credit period in each of the last five years; [1121]

(3) how his Department publicises payment practices other than as percentages of invoices paid late; [966]

(4) what is the average length of time it takes for his Department to pay invoices. [921]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 November 1995]: Much of the information sought either is not available or could be assembled only at disproportionate cost.

My Department's prompt payment performance is checked by means of a random survey which monitors approximately 4,000 invoices over the course of each year with the purpose of identifying invoices paid later than 30 days after receipt, or after the agreed credit period. In 1994–95, 16 per cent., or approximately 640, of these invoices were found to fall into one or other of these categories. As I have made clear before, this was clearly an unsatisfactory performance which we are seeking to address through the introduction of a challenging performance target for this year. The survey does not, however, gather information on the size of the companies involved, the amounts outstanding or the average time taken to make payment.

My Department publishes its payment performance in the form of a percentage figure which gives the proportion of invoices paid either within 30 days or within an agreed credit period. The overall results of the annual survey are published in the departmental report, a copy of which is placed in the Library of the House. The 30-day target for paying invoices is itself published in the DTI standard terms and conditions of contract for supplies.

TREASURY

Corporation Tax

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the latest rates of corporation tax applicable to shipping companies in each country of the European Union; and if he will make it his policy to bring United Kingdom rates into line with those elsewhere in the European Union. [2111]

Mr. Jack: The rate of corporation tax in the United Kingdom is kept under frequent review. The UK continues to provide one of the lowest main rates in the European Union. The current main national rates of corporation tax applicable to shipping companies in each European Union country are in the table.

Main national rates of corporation tax applicable to shipping companies in the European Union

Country	Percentage Rate
Austria	34
Belgium	[1]39
Denmark	34
Finland	25
France	[2]33.33
Germany	[3]45

Sweden	28
United Kingdom	33

Notes:

[1] There is also a surcharge of 3 per cent., making an effective rate of 40.17 per cent.

[2] There is also a surcharge of 10 per cent., making an effective rate of 36.66 per cent.

[3] There is also a surcharge of 7.5 per cent. and local trade taxes (of an average 20 per cent.) which give an average total effective rate of 58 per cent. For distributed profits, the main rate is 30 per cent., giving an effective rate of 46.25 per cent. Companies engaged in international shipping can elect for certain of their profits (normally 80 per cent.) to be taxed at half the average rates they would otherwise pay provided relief in respect of any foreign tax borne by those profits is forfeited.

[4] Profits from shipping are not subject to corporation tax. Instead a special tax, based on gross tonnage and age, is charged on usage of a vessel.

[5] This special rate of corporation tax applies to manufacturing and the sale of goods. Certain shipping activities are deemed to be manufacturing for this purpose.

[6] There is also local tax at 16.2 per cent., making an effective rate of 53.2 per cent.

[7] There is also a surcharge of 4 per cent. and local trade taxes (in range of 8 per cent.–12 per cent.) which give an effective rate of 40.9 per cent.

[8] The main rate is only applied to 30 per cent. of the profits from maritime transport activities. In Madeira corporation tax does not apply to profits arising from the operation of Madeira-registered vessels in international waters.

[9] There is also a surcharge of 1 per cent., giving an effective rate of 35.35 per cent. In the Canary Islands shipping companies are granted up to a 35 per cent. reduction in corporation tax, giving a minimum possible effective rate of 22.75 per cent.

Heroin and Semtex

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further actions Customs and Excise is taking to identify heroin and semtex at airports. [1634]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 23 November 1995]: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise continues to assess the risk of smuggling of these commodities and to deploy anti-smuggling teams to address those risks. Training programmes for these teams include the identification and handling of the materials. Detector dogs and scientific aids are used as appropriate.

Tax Revenue

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate, in current prices, the net revenue forgone in each year since 1988–89 as a result of the reduction in personal income tax for higher rate taxpayers introduced by the Finance Act 1988; and what has been the total number of beneficiaries in each year, by region. [87]

Mr. Jack: Available information is in the table. Figures for earlier years were given in the reply to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 17 December 1993, Official Report, columns 969-70. Some regional estimates are based on small samples and all amounts are given to the nearest £50 million.

Number of taxpayers affected and increases in tax revenue resulting from reinstating tax rates over 40 per cent.

[1] Includes members of the forces and merchant navy and a small number of civil servants serving overseas who are not all allocated to regions.

VAT

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those bodies which are able under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 to recover value added tax; and if he will make a statement on how the EC sixth VAT directive restricts changes to eligibility to recover value added tax. [1807]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The public bodies eligible for refunds of VAT under section 33 of the Value Added Tax Act 1994 are too numerous to be individually identified. In addition to the general categories listed in section 33(3)

(a) to (j), other bodies such as the National Rivers Authority, the Environment Agency and probation and magistrates courts committees have been added from time to time under section 33(3)(k).

Section 33 bodies are treated under the VAT system in much the same way as other taxable persons, except that, where they are carrying out statutory obligations outside the scope of the tax, they may recover their input tax. This accords with the general principles governing the tax treatment of public bodies laid down in the EC sixth VAT directive.

Domestic Fuel

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate, by region, the average weekly expenditure in 1997–98 and 1996–97 of (a) all households, (b) families with children, (c) non-retired households and (d) retired households, on domestic fuel, showing separately for 1995–96 the extra expenditure as a result of VAT at 8 per cent. [92]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Table 5.1 of the CSO report "Family Spending: A report on the 1994–95 Family Expenditure Survey" provides the latest published data. Figures for 1995–96 and subsequent years will depend on the future level of fuel prices, and on what happens to incomes and spending patterns.

Labour Force Survey

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the latest annual figures available on (a) the number of young people aged 25 years and under in the work force and (b) the number and proportion who are not in full-time or part-time employment; and if he will provide comparable information for each of the member states of the European Union. [1790]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Estimates from the spring—March to May—1995 labour force survey show that there were 4,622,000 economically active people in the United Kingdom aged 16 to 24, of whom 706,000—15 per cent.—were International Labour Organisation unemployed.

The latest European comparisons on young people aged under 25 in the labour market are published by Eurostat in "Statistics in focus: Labour Force Survey Principal Results 1994". A copy of the publication is available in the Library.

Written Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Capital Receipts

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities (a) have taken and (b) are taking advantage of the relaxation in the rules on the application of capital receipts to sell their municipal airports, bus companies and crematoriums. [1992]

Sir Paul Beresford: We understand that the sale of Bournemouth airport has been completed since the relaxation came into force. We do not yet have any information on sales of bus companies, and the relaxation in respect of crematoriums does not begin until 1 January 1996.

Local Government

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the periodic electoral reviews that the Local Government Commission must undertake after it has completed the current district reviews. [1905]

Sir Paul Beresford: Decisions on the statutory programme of periodic electoral reviews—PERs—are a matter for the local Government Commission, subject to the time constraints set down in the Local Government Act 1992. We understand that the commission is considering the programme of PERs which it will carry out once it has completed the district structure reviews.

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2039]

Sir Paul Beresford: Within the last five years, this Department has been responsible for two Acts of Parliament which contain provision for statutory repeal or review.

Section 128 of the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 allows the Secretary of State to provide by order that sections 126 and 127—housing welfare services—should cease to have effect.

Schedule 24 of the Environment Act 1995 provides for the repeal of earlier provisions in the Act which deal with transitional provisions in respect of national parks.

This Department has a programme to review on a regular basis all its legislation which affects business.

Local Authority Political Groups

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authority political groups have appointed paid assistants. [2391]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department neither collects nor holds this information centrally.

Power Cables

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evaluation his Department has made of the effect on property prices and the difficulties in obtaining a mortgage for properties located beneath power cables; and if he will make a statement. [1964]

Mr. Clappison: My Department has not undertaken such an evaluation. The market value of a property will reflect a variety of factors, including neighbouring development. I am not aware that, as a matter of policy, mortgage lenders are refusing to advance loans on properties in close proximity to overhead power lines.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1945]

Sir Paul Beresford: Information on the size of suppliers is not held centrally and is obtainable only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many small and medium enterprises benefited from properties made available by English Estates in each of the last five years; and how many small and medium enterprises have benefited from properties made available by English Partnerships in the last year for which figures are available. [1939]

Sir Paul Beresford: Information is not available on the size of companies occupying properties provided by English Estates or English Partnerships. The following table gives the number of new occupancies of properties of less than 1,700m^2 and thus an indication of the take up by small or medium enterprises. The figures relate to a period during which the overall size of the portfolio reduced by some 30 per cent.

Number of new occupancies of properties under 1,700m^2

1990–91: 1,272

1991–92: 1,333

1992–93: 1,343

1993–94: 1,067

1994–95: 1,032.

English Partnerships took over responsibility for English Estates' activities on 1 April 1994.

Single Regeneration Budget

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total funding for the single regeneration budget in actual terms and adjusted for inflation in each year since its inception; and what percentage of this funding was disbursed through competitive bidding in each of those years. [1938]

Sir Paul Beresford: The single regeneration budget was established in April 1994. Funding has been as follows:

	£ million (cash)	£ million (1995–96 prices)	Percentage disbursed through competitive bidding
1994–95 (estimated out-turn)	1,467	1,500	16
1995–96 (planned expenditure)	1,348	1,348	27

Programmes within the SRB that targeted resources on projects selected by competition included city challenge—in both 1994–95 and 1995–96—and the £125 million SRB challenge fund—in 1995–96. Both programmes seek to maximise investment and support from the private sector over and above public moneys. Since resources are limited, assistance under other support regimes—for example Estate Action—are also concentrated on projects likely to provide the best value for money.

Housing Bill

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available information about the proposed bill on housing in simple text and pictorial format and on audio tape for people with learning disabilities. [1965]

Mr. Clappison: When the housing legislation is published, my Department will be willing to co-operate with bodies who wish to produce material for people with learning disabilities.

Planning Applications

Sir John Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he employs to set the level at which local authorities can charge for a planning permission application; and what is the relationship between this and the actual cost to the local authority of dealing with an application for planning permission. [2261]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The calculation of the proportion of costs deemed to be covered by planning application fees is based on Price Waterhouse's 1994 report for the Department, entitled "The Costs of Determining Planning Applications and the Development Control Service" and on information collected from local authorities on the income derived from fees. We estimate that the proportion of planning application costs recovered through fees in England is now approaching 100 per cent. and we will shortly be making an announcement about future fee levels.

Dearne Valley Partnership

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permanent jobs have been provided with the involvement of Dearne Valley partnership within the city grant area; and what is the proportion of total expenditure by the partnership which each of these jobs represents. [2380]

Sir Paul Beresford: In the three years to 31 March 1995 the Dearne Valley strategy has helped to create almost 1,100 jobs. Three of the partnership's strategic objects relate to employment creation and have involved 55 per cent. of city challenge expenditure over the same period.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums have spent in or with the involvement of the Dearne Valley partnership in each of the last three years on (a) land reclamation, (b) creation of employment, (c) administration and (d) social and community protection. [2379]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Dearne Valley partnership is responsible for overseeing the regeneration of the Dearne valley together with other public and private sector partners. The city challenge action plan has six strategic objectives.

SO1: To develop the local economy;

SO2: To diversify the local economy;

SO3: To improve education and skill levels;

SO4: To build capacity within the community;

SO5: To improve the physical environment;

SO6: To increase and improve the housing stock and its environment.

From a provisional city challenge annual allocation of £7.5 million, expenditure for which the Dearne Valley partnership is directly responsible was as follows:

£ thousands

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95
Employment creation (strategic objectives 1, 2 and 3)	4,125.2	3,984.2	2,820.1
Administration	300.0	300.0	300.0
Community development (including community safety) strategic objective 4)	634.5	708.5	797.5

Land reclamation was funded through complementary non-city challenge, derelict land grant as follows:

£ thousand

	Land reclamation
1992–93	1,125.0
1993–94	3,561.0
1994–95	6,473.0

Dearne Valley Partnership.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sum has been expended by the Dearne Valley partnership in the fulfilment of its role in each of the last 10 years, and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year. [2381]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Dearne Valley partnership was formed in 1991. It has received city challenge funding since 1992. City challenge expenditure has been as follows:

1992–93: £7.10 million

1993–94: £7.15 million

1994–95: £7.50 million

1995–96: £8.65 million (estimate).

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons are employed in either a full or a part-time capacity by or in the Dearne Valley partnership; and what has been the total cost of this employment in each in the last three years. [2378]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Dearne Valley partnership currently employs 15 full-time staff. All city challenge partnerships are required to contain their running costs within 4 per cent. of their total five-year allocation. In the case of the Dearne valley, running costs—which include the costs of 10 staff, office accommodation and equipment, transport, supplies and services, and small consultancies—have been as follows:

1992–93: £300,000

1993–94: £300,000

1994–95: £300,000.

The remaining five staff form part of the marketing team and are funded separately within a marketing budget of:

1992–93: Nil

1993–94: £288,000

1994–95: £458,000.

Ostrich Farms

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many ostrich farms have been licensed under the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976, in each appropriate administrative area of Scotland, Wales, England and Northern Ireland. [2162]

Mr. Clappison: This information is not held centrally. Responsibility for the issue of licences under the Act rests with individual local authorities. The 1976 Act does not extend to Northern Ireland.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Royal Ordnance plc

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the relationship between his Department, Royal Ordnance and PRB; and which countries were supplied with armaments and defence equipment arising from it. [1032]

Mr. David Davis: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement on 24 November, Official Report, column 344.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for his Department in 1993–94. [1919]

Mr. David Davis: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government—funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. This Department does not have any policy responsibilities for Community research and development expenditure.

Fundamental Expenditure Review

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, when he expects to publish the fundamental expenditure review. [2316]

Mr. Hanley: I expect to place copies of the FCO, diplomatic wing, and ODA fundamental expenditure reviews in the Library of the House shortly.

European Free Trade Association

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of negotiations about European Free Trade Association membership by countries of central and eastern Europe. [1233]

Mr. David Davis: No such negotiations are taking place. Slovenia has signed a bilateral free trade agreement with EFTA and Estonia has initialled a similar agreement. However, these agreements do not hold out the prospects of membership of EFTA. The central and east European countries with association agreements with the EU continue to aspire to membership of the EU itself.

EU National Parliaments

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals his Department has to give effect to declaration No. 13 of the Maastricht treaty relating to the role of national Parliaments. [1235]

Mr. David Davis: The Government are committed to enhancing the role of national Parliaments in the EU and are considering a number of proposals to give fuller effect to declaration No. 13. These include proposals put forward by the European Legislation Committee.

UN Convention on Mercenaries

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of the United Nations convention on mercenaries. [1349]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We do not intend to accede to the UN convention on mercenaries, as we believe that it would be difficult to enforce its provisions. Only nine states have now acceded to the treaty.

Military Equipment Embargoes

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries currently subject to embargoes on the export of British military equipment. [1350]

Mr. David Davis: We observe mandatory embargoes imposed by the United Nations on Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Liberia, UNITA (Angola) and Rwanda.

We will continue to observe the arms embargo on all the states of the former Yugoslavia in accordance with UN Security Council resolution 1021 of 22 November 1995.

We also observe embargoes imposed by the European Union on China, Burma, Zaire, Sudan and Nigeria.

We observe a voluntary embargo agreed by the then Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe on Armenia and Azerbaijan.

In addition, as a matter of declared national policy, we refuse to supply military equipment to Argentina and Iran.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council, held on 20 to 21 November, giving details of all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [1597]

Mr. David Davis: The A items listed in document 11618/95, which will be deposited in the Library of the House as soon as it is available, were adopted, except for that on Nigeria, which was the subject of substantive discussion.

The Council took note of the European Parliament resolutions in document 10794/95 PE-RE 73. A copy of this document will be deposited in the Library of the House as soon as it is available.

On Mediterranean policy, the Council discussed preparations for the Barcelona conference. It also considered the draft MEDA regulation, on assistance to countries in the Mediterranean region. The item was referred back to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further consideration and will be examined again at the 4 to 5 December Council.

The Council briefly discussed the prospects for the 9 December Paris conference on economic assistance for Palestinians.

The Commission presented draft negotiating directives for a new EU-Chile framework co-operation agreement. This was remitted to COREPER for further work.

The Commission presented an outline of a communication on future humanitarian aid to former Yugoslavia, focusing on aid quantity and quality and the need to ensure success of future rehabilitation and repatriation programmes.

The Commission briefly introduced draft negotiating directives for an agreement between the EC and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. This was remitted to COREPER for further work.

The Commission also presented a paper on reconstruction, co-ordination and financing in former Yugoslavia. The Council took note and asked COREPER to take the work forward. The Council agreed to a fact-finding mission on the needs of the high representative and his staff and the principle of a joint action on the EU contribution to the costs of the high representative and his staff in Sarajevo and Brussels.

On Nigeria, the Council adopted a common position covering a ban on military sales, an extension of the visa regime to civilian members of the Nigerian Government and suspension of EU aid. The Council also agreed to examine further measures.

The Council agreed, by qualified majority, a negotiating mandate which would provide for 5 per cent. increases in agriculture quotas, year on year, for central and east European countries, with a list of exceptions. The UK, Denmark, Sweden and the Netherlands voted against, and issued an explanatory declaration. The Commission expressed strong regret at the Council's decision.

The Council adopted conclusions on EU-Russia relations.

The Council agreed in principle to an EU contribution to the Korean Peninsular Energy Development Organisation—KEDO—but instructed COREPER to consider the matter further, including the size of the EU contribution.

On EU-US relations, the Council agreed an action plan to be endorsed at the EU-US summit on 3 December, including a commitment to a study on ways to reduce and eliminate trade barriers.

The presidency gave a brief progress report on negotiations with third countries for tariff compensation following enlargement, under GATT article XXIV.6.

The Council agreed to the current proposed composition of the WTO appellate body.

The Council had a further discussion of a draft for a new TACIS—Technical Assistance for the Commonwealth of Independent States—regulation. COREPER was tasked to carry out further work and the Foreign Affairs Council will consider the issue again on 4 December.

Only one vote was taken—that on EU-central and eastern European agricultural trade.

The EU-Nepal co-operation agreement and the EU-Israel association agreement were signed in the margins of the Council. There were also meetings with the Foreign Ministers of the EEA and of Cyprus and Malta, in the context of the structured dialogue.

I should also like to take this opportunity to record that at a special meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council on 10 November the Council reached agreement on an EU-Morocco association agreement.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1946]

Mr. Hanley: Business transacted by the FCO, diplomatic wing, with small and medium enterprises in the United Kingdom in 1994–95 accounted for 43.5 per cent. of its total expenditure on the purchase of goods and services.

The ODA does not collect statistics for procurement that record whether a company is of small or medium size.

Air Strikes, Srebrenica

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the information he has received since 12 July relating to requests to United Nations headquarters in Zagreb in July for air strikes to protect Srebrenica. [2156]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have received no information which adds materially to the statement made in the House by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on 12 July.

Guatemalan Police Officers

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what form of training has been given by Britain to Guatemalan police officers in the period since July 1994. [2815]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Britain has provided no training for Guatemalan police officers since July 1994. We have, however, sent two police experts in handwriting and fingerprinting to assess Guatemalan capabilities in this field. They went in July 1995.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what selection criteria are adopted when choosing Guatemalan police officers for training in Britain; and if this includes consideration of their human rights record. [2813]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: No Guatemalan police officers have been trained in Britain in recent years.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the hon. Member for Wallsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 10 October concerning a constituent. [2725]

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Member's letter of 10 October to the Home Office on behalf of his constituent, Mr. Ashok Singh, was received in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's migration and visa correspondence unit on 1 November. A reply was sent on 23 November.

International Sanctions

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken, and on what dates, to freeze the personal accounts or assets of members of regimes with whom the United Kingdom is in dispute as part of a national or international sanctions policy. [2565]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The United Kingdom has no unilateral sanctions in place against the assets or personal accounts of foreign regimes. However, we do implement the mandatory financial sanctions imposed by the UN Security Council. Such financial sanctions are in place against Iraq, in UNSCR 661—adopted on 6 August 1990—and Libya, in UNSCR 863—adopted on 11 November 1993.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Procedures

Mr. Robathan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on company rescues following the recent consultation on company voluntary arrangements. [3079]

Mr. Oppenheim: The recent company voluntary arrangements consultation revealed continued support for the introduction of a short moratorium that is binding on all creditors. I therefore intend to introduce legislation to effect a scheme broadly as described in consultative document when parliamentary time allows, although usage will be restricted to small companies as defined in section 247 of the Companies Act 1985. However, I am still reflecting on what was said regarding the requirement to give five days' notice of the intention to appoint an administrative receiver. I have yet to decide whether it is necessary to have a mandatory provision, or whether, in response to the invitation I have issued to the British Bankers Association, the banks can come up with a binding code of practice which obviates that need.

Recent rescues of financially troubled companies, where, by agreement, debt is converted into equity, have proved very successful. However, it is evident that many are not aware of the rescue potential of debt equity swaps or how they work. I intend approaching those involved early next year to see how they think awareness and usage, in appropriate cases, can be increased.

I also propose at the same time to seek the views of banks, business and advisers on whether it is feasible to devise a mechanism whereby an administrative receiver, appointed following notice of an administration petition, can be replaced by an administrator in cases where it is clear that a floating charge holder's security can be shown not to be at risk. If this was possible, it would give the ordinary creditors the opportunity of some say in any rescue without prejudicing the secured creditors.

Legislation might provide a tool to achieve a rescue, but it cannot achieve a rescue of itself. The responsibility for that lies squarely on the shoulders of directors and their advisers. Remedial action should be taken earlier rather than later and this is the key to saving more companies. I therefore intend to discuss with business, banks and advisers what they can do to ensure that all those involved are aware of what must be done and when.

I am making arrangements for copies of the responses to the recent public consultation on CVAs to be placed in the library of my Department.

Distance Selling Directive

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will estimate the number of jobs in the United Kingdom arising from the implementation of the proposed European Union distance selling directive; and if he will make a statement. [2063]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My Department has consulted interested parties on the cost of complying with the proposals tabled in the directive with a view to establishing the potential burden on business, and the extent to which they provide necessary consumer protection. We are content that the common position achieves a satisfactory balance, and we have not been made aware of any potential job losses.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has made to the European Union regarding the distance selling directive; and if he will make a statement. [2062]

Mr. Evans: A European Commission proposal for a directive on distance selling has been under negotiation since 1992. We have participated fully in negotiations in the Council of Ministers and its working group on this matter, and are, as a result, content with the common position adopted in June 1995.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on mail ordering and telemarketing sales techniques and the effects on British industry of possible changes in the rules governing telemarketing by the distance selling directive. [2064]

Mr. Evans: The Government are concerned that the European Parliament may vote for a proposal to make prior consent from consumers obligatory before unsolicited telephone sales calls can take place, and for other proposals which will prevent distance selling businesses from operating flexibly and efficiently. We have briefed Members of the European Parliament about United Kingdom concerns over the potential impact on industry and will be making further representations.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for his Department in 1993–94. [1906]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. My Department's policy responsibilities are subject to change and can vary from year to year. My Department currently has responsibility for 71.14 per cent. of the Community's research and development budget.

European Centre for Industrial Relations

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade who represented Her Majesty's Government at the opening of the European Centre for Industrial Relations; what consultations took place; and if he will make a statement. [1039]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Two officials—the head of DTI's industrial relations division, and the head of Department for Education and Employment's European Communities branch—attended the inauguration of the European Centre for Industrial Relations.

As mentioned in the Commission's social action programme for 1995–97, the centre was established at the initiative of the social partners at European level. The Commission issued a communication about the centre to the Council, COM (95) 445 final, on 25 September 1995. This will be deposited in the Library of the House under the usual procedures for depositing EU documentation and I am arranging for a copy to be sent to the hon. Member.

Walker Wingsail Systems

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what financial assistance was given by his Department to Walker Wingsail Systems plc, Plymouth, before 1988. [2303]

Mr. Page: My Department provided £207,500 in financial assistance to Walker Wingsail Systems Ltd. of Hamble, Hampshire under the support for innovation scheme before 1988, prior to the company's move to Plymouth.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what monitoring has taken place of the grants made by his Department to Walker Wingsail Systems plc, Plymouth. [2302]

Mr. Page: Grants made to Walker Wingsail Systems Ltd. under the support for innovation scheme were monitored at each payment stage, to ensure that payments were in accordance with the approved project. In the case of financial assistance under the enterprise initiative consultancy scheme, payment of a proportion of the cost of consultancy advice provided to the company was made by my Department to the consultants via the external contractors appointed as SFI scheme managers. The company itself paid the balance. The contractors monitored the performance and quality of the consultants' work before agreeing to the payment.

Retail Newsagents

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to keep under review a further reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the supply of newspapers and magazines to the retail newsagents' sector; and if he will make a statement. [2090]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: This is a matter for the Director General of Fair Trading who, under the competition legislation, is responsible for keeping markets under review, and has independent powers to make a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current position of the small firms training challenge. [1935]

Mr. Page: The first award winners in the skill challenge for small firms were announced jointly by myself and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment on 22 November 1995, Official Report, columns 208–9. Fourteen projects have been successful in the first round, involving about 180 companies.

The deadline for the second round of bids is 31 December 1995, with winners to be announced in mid-February 1996. A total of 100 projects will be funded, including the first 14, with an average award of around £50,000.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what advice his Department issues to other Government Departments regarding the tendering process for small firms. [1933]

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many loans were made under the small firms loans guarantee scheme in each year since the scheme began. [1941]

Mr. Page: The number of loans guaranteed in each year since the scheme began is:

Year

1981–82: 3,351
1982–83: 6,045
1983–84: 4,889
1984–85: 2,081
1985–86: 543
1986–87: 1,042
1987–88: 1,222
1988–89: 2,266
1989–90: 3,204
1990–91: 3,387
1991–92: 2,933
1992–93: 2,342
1993–94: 3,886
1994–95: 6,207
1995–96: 3,585 (Estimated to September 1995).

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury is responsible for issuing guidance and best practice on procurement issues to Government Departments on the tendering process for all Government procurement.

In addition, this department also produces a guide for Government procurement officers on purchasing from small firms called "Think Big, Buy Small" and a guide for small firms on "Tendering for Government Contracts", which contains advice on and details of the procurement requirements for each of the Government Departments. Both of these publications are currently being updated.

Business Links

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the cost to public funds of the business links freephone number since it began; and how many calls it has taken in that time. [1930]

Mr. Page: The national business link freephone hotline was established in October 1994, utilising the existing 0800 500 200 number previously used for the enterprise initiative. The cost of calls and of the subsequent literature fulfilment to end October 1995, totalled £76,000 and 17,259 calls were handled during the period.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement regarding his Department's proposals for implementing the European Commission's community initiative for small and medium enterprises. [1937]

Mr. Page: The Community SME initiative programme for England will be implemented as a series of sub-programmes for each of the structural funds objective 1,2 and 5(b) areas in England for the period 1996 to 1999, with total Community funding of 47.4 mecu, £36.5 million. These programmes are being drawn up by Government offices, in consultation with local bodies in each area. The programmes are intended to focus on cross-frontier networking between SMEs in England and other Community member states, with projects normally delivered through business links, regional supply offices and training and enterprise councils. They will complement the additional funding for new, local designed, business development programmes which was announced in the competitiveness White Paper, "Forging Ahead", Cm 2867 last June. It is expected that area programmes will be agreed with the Commission from early 1996 and will open for applications from business support organisations shortly thereafter.

Separate programmes for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have been adopted by Commission and operate under the responsibility of the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland Offices.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1956]

Mr. Page: The information sought is not available and could be assembled only at disproportionate cost.

Patent Office Services

Mr. Touhig: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what considerations underlay his decision that a private sector organisation would be better equipped to deliver a specific Patent Office service; what will be the performance standard required; and if he will list the required criteria for the award other than value for money. [2099]

Mr. Ian Taylor: A number of Patent Office services are in the early stages of competitive tender to assess whether they can be better provided by the private sector. Any bids will be assessed against the benchmark of continuing in-house provision for higher quality or more cost-effective delivery. Additional criteria will be appropriate to the particular service but commonly include the bidder's understanding of the office's needs, the ability to bring innovative approaches to the delivery of the services, the continuity of services offered and commitment to developing a co-operative partnership with the DTI.

Mr. Touhig: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what systems are in place in the Patent Office to take account of benchmarking procedures when examining bids against in-house provision. [2097]

Mr. Taylor: In any contractorisation project, the Patent Office will draw up a benchmark based on the costs and quality of in-house provision. Guidelines have been developed to ensure that any benchmark is fair and soundly constructed.

Mr. Touhig: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what efficiency improvements have been agreed by staff and management in the Patent Office in regard to (a) benchmarking and (b) re-engineering; and what consultation procedures are in place with the trade unions. [2098]

Mr. Taylor: The Patent Office is constantly looking for ways to improve efficiency and quality of service through measures such as reorganisation of staff structures, re-engineering of work processes, and contractorisation.

Staff and their trade union representatives are consulted at appropriate stages in the implementation of these measures.

Mr. Touhig: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the proposed cost of Patent Office services currently under consideration for contracting out. [2100]

Mr. Taylor: Areas of the Patent Office which are under consideration for contracting out are the office's information technology services, its marketing and awareness programme, its accommodation and office services, and the operations of its London front office. The overall annual costs of these are £5.888 million, £1.608 million, £2.056 million and £1.125 million respectively.

Labour Statistics (Shipbuilding)

Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the numbers in employment in (a) shipbuilding and (b) ship repair for each of the last 10 years. [2153]

Mr. Page: The available information is given in the table. The figures are taken from the census of employment which was conducted every three years up to 1987 and every two years thereafter. Ship repairing is not separately distinguished from shipbuilding in the census.

Mr. Michael Johnson

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will have finished consideration of points of law in the case of Mr. Michael Johnson; and when he hopes to conclude the case. [2260]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 24 November 1995:]: Consideration of points of law is a matter for the judiciary. I understand that Mr. Johnson won his industrial tribunal case for unfair dismissal and was awarded compensation in lieu of reinstatement. He subsequently applied to the tribunal chairman for a review of two aspects of the decision, but this request was refused. I am advised that Mr. Johnson was informed of this decision on 24 May 1995.

Irish Steel Ltd.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he will take with regard to the approval of the European Commission of state aid (a) before and (b) after the purchase of Irish Steel Ltd. by a foreign company. [2382]

Mr. Eggar: The European Commission's proposal to allow exceptional state aid for Irish Steel is subject to the unanimous approval of EU member states. The United Kingdom will not give its assent unless conditions are attached that will mitigate the adverse effects of the aid on the UK steel industry. The UK will ensure that the aid, if approved, is strictly monitored to ensure compliance with the agreed conditions.

Chronic Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total number of miners and former miners made an award for PD12D chronic bronchitis and emphysema, since September, broken down for each region. [1403]

Mr. Roger Evans: I have been asked to reply.

The information is not available in the format requested. The available information is set out in the tables:

Asbestosis

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many miners and former miners have been diagnosed to be suffering from asbestosis for which an award has been made in the last 10 years broken down by region. [1173]

Mr. Evans: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Cable Broadcasting

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if she will make it her policy to accelerate the introduction of digital terrestrial broadcasting in those rural and semi-rural areas which are not cabled; [2591]

(2) by what date digital terrestrial broadcasting is to reach 95 per cent. of the population of England. [2590]

Mr. Sproat: The Broadcasting Bill, announced in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, will provide the legislative framework for the introduction of digital terrestrial television services. The Government propose that those who wish to provide these services be required to meet targets, set by the Independent Television Commission, for making them available by a specific time to a specified proportion of the population. The precise potential coverage of the available digital frequencies, and the speed and pattern of the introduction of services on them, will vary, and it is not possible as yet to predict the outcome of the licensing process the Bill will propose to introduce.

Satellite Broadcasting

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the future responsibilities of the ITC in respect of satellite broadcasters promoting television services in the United Kingdom which offend against public decency, following proposed United Kingdom and EC legislation. [158]

Mr. Sproat: The Government have no plans to change the ITC's responsibilities in this area.

Culture Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the outcome of the Culture Council, held on 20 November, giving details of all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [1598]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) on 23 November Official Report, column 285–6.

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what legislation from her Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2040]

Mr. Sproat: My Department, since its inception in 1992, has introduced no legislation containing provision for statutory repeal or review.

BBC Charter and Agreement

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when the BBC's new charter and agreement will be published. [3161]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today placed in the Library of the House drafts of the BBC's new charter and the agreement between me and the corporation. The House will have an opportunity to consider these documents in the near future. The BBC's transmission services will be privatised. The BBC will retain the proceeds of sale related to licence fee funded transmission facilities.

The future costs of transmission will be regulated to ensure that the BBC does not pay more for the services that it currently needs and benefits from any productivity savings. This is good news for licence fee payers.

The BBC has welcomed these arrangements and said that it will invest the proceeds of sale within the BBC on digital production technology so that it is well placed to reap the benefits of digital broadcasting.

I look forward to a secure long-term future for the BBC's public services within the framework of the proposed new charter and agreement.

BBC

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what action her Department is currently taking in relation to the production of proposals for the future of the BBC's transmission services; [1744]

(2) when she first anticipated being able to make an announcement on the future of the BBC's transmission services; and what factors underlay the delay in making this statement; [1711]

(3) when her Department expects to be able to make an announcement on the future of the BBC's transmission services; [1713]

(4) what factors underlay the separate timings for (a) her announcements on the future of the BBC's transmission services and (b) the publication of her Department's guidance on digital terrestrial broadcasting. [1745]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 23 November 1995]: As indicated in my answer to the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) on 20 November Official Report, column 44 we will announce our decision on the future of the BBC transmission services shortly. It was always our intention to announce our decision once we had fully explored with the BBC possible options for the future of its transmission services, taking account of the development of its plans for digital broadcasting. The policy document, "Digital Terrestrial Broadcasting", Cm 2946, was published in August to provide an opportunity for comment on the Government's proposals in order to inform the preparation of the Broadcasting Bill announced in the Gracious Speech.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which she has responsibility, in each year since 1990. [1455]

Mr. Robin Squire: Prior to their merger in July 1995, energy consumption was reported separately for the former Employment Department group and the former Department for Education. The percentage changes, as issued by the energy and environment advisory division of the Department of the Environment, for each of the two former Departments, are as follows:

Percentage changes in energy cost per unit area (£/sq m) over base year 1990–91

(corrected for fuel costs and weather)

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94
Employment Department Group	+1	+4	+2
Department for Education	+20	+82	+95

The substantial increase in energy consumption in DFE beginning in reporting year 1991–92 resulted from the transfer of London-based staff from a naturally ventilated building to a new building with heating and air conditioning plant, with a smaller floor area. The baseline for the energy-saving exercise applied to the old building.

Raw data for 1994–95 have been reported by both former departments to the energy and environment advisory division. Corrected figures are not yet available.

Degree Courses

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research her Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the correlation between grades obtained at A-level and performance in higher education degree examinations. [1267]

Mr. Forth: My Department has not commissioned any research on this topic. There have been a number of such studies, usually small scale, and these have tended to show that there is a positive correlation between individuals' A-level score and degree class but this is small. It is for universities to determine the suitability of applicants for degree courses.

Severe Learning Difficulties

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many schools catering for children with severe learning difficulties have invoked the national curriculum disapplication procedure, by local education authority, in each of the last three years. [1816]

Mrs. Gillan: Information is available only for 1994 and does not distinguish disapplication from modification of national curriculum requirements. The following table shows, for each local education authority in England, the number of maintained special schools approved to cater for pupils with severe learning difficulties which reported pupils for whom the national curriculum had been modified or disapplied in January 1994.

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance she has issued as to the circumstances in which a school for children with severe learning difficulties should apply for the disapplication of national curriculum procedure. [1818]

Mrs. Gillan: The revised national curriculum statutory documents state that study material may be selected from earlier or later key stages where this is necessary to enable individual pupils to progress and demonstrate achievement. This flexibility should reduce the necessity for formal disapplication or modification of the requirements.

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the disadvantages for a school catering for children with severe learning difficulties of applying for national curriculum disapplication for some of its pupils. [1817]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made no such assessment. Pupils should be allowed to benefit from the national curriculum to the extent of their abilities, but it is not always possible to reconcile the difficulties of certain children with an entitlement to the full national curriculum. In these cases disapplication or modification may be appropriate.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for her Department in 1993–94. [1908]

Mr. Forth: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. Departments' policy responsibilities are subject to change and can vary from year to year. The former Education and Employment Departments had responsibility for 1.5 per cent. of the Community's R and D budget.

Capital Expenditure, Derbyshire

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will set out the outturn figures for capital expenditure in each Derbyshire school for the last 10 years. [2215]

Mrs. Gillan: This information is not collected centrally.

Teleworkers

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action she intends to take to extend existing employment and health and safety regulations to protect teleworkers. [2117]

Mr. Forth: Teleworkers are covered by existing employment and health and safety regulations in the same way as other workers. The Employment Department published "A Manager's Guide to Teleworking" in May 1995 which contains information and advice on existing regulations. The Government at present see no need for special regulations on teleworkers.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what were the costs to public funds involved in preparing the cost-benefit assessment contained in the explanatory memorandum for the Deregulation Length of the School Day Order 1995; [2017]

(2) what estimates she has made of the annual saving to business which accrue from the Deregulation Length of the School Day Order 1995. [2018]

Mr. Forth: As the explanatory memorandum makes clear, there are no cost implications involved in these proposals; so no cost-benefit assessment was required.

The Deregulation Length of the School Day Order 1995 is intended to speed up alterations to school session times. Schools do not receive extra funds for having a longer day or reduced funds for having a shorter day. Any savings to schools and their governing bodies will be measured in time saved in implementing changes to the length of the school day.

Nursery Vouchers

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make available information about the proposed Bill on nursery education in simple text and pictorial format and on audio tape for people with learning difficulties. [1966]

Mr. Robin Squire: An information leaflet for parents about the nursery voucher scheme is already available in ethnic minority languages, braille and on audio cassette.

A more detailed policy document on the nursery voucher scheme will be published early in the new year, including a version for parents.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of her Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1944]

Mr. Forth: The information is not available in the form requested.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much public money has been invested in small firms training loans since their launch. [1934]

Mr. Paice: Between June 1994, when small firms training loans were introduced, and the end of October 1995, £404,000 in Government funding has been spent on the scheme.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many firms have applied for loans from the small firms training loans programme; and what is the total amount to date out on loan. [2265]

Mr. Paice: At 21 November, 44 small firms training loans had been agreed, with £427,728 on loan. The banks have informed the Department that six applications for loans have been rejected.

Job Sharing

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what new proposals she has to encourage job sharing. [2157]

Mr. Forth: In the deregulated labour market of the United Kingdom more people work in flexible working patterns than in most other European countries. The Government encourage employers to consider the benefits of flexible working patterns, which can be particularly attractive to people who wish to combine a job or career with family commitments. The Department for Education and Employment and the former Employment Department have published a number of booklets, including "The Best of Both Worlds", "Be Flexible" and "Rising to the Challenge", providing information and advice on flexible working arrangements, including job sharing.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent by the Government on the assisted places scheme (a) in total, up to but not including the latest available year and (b) in the latest available year; what additional money will be made available in the planned expansion of the scheme; and how many pupils are involved in the latest available year in (i) Manchester grammar school, (ii) Manchester high school for girls and (iii) William Hume's grammar school, Manchester. [2740]

Mrs. Gillan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 24 October, Official Report, column 623.

The amount available for the scheme in the supply estimates for the financial year 1995–96 is £104.4 million. Provision for 1996–97, when the scheme's expansion is planned to begin, and for succeeding years will be announced in due course. The numbers of pupils holding assisted places in the current academic year—1995–96—at the three Manchester schools cited are (i) 262, (ii) 179 and (iii) 220 respectively.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1418]

Mr. John M. Taylor: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. No public interest immunity certificates have been signed either by me or the Lord Chancellor since our appointments.

Divorce Reform

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on his proposals for divorce reform. [1406]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Family Law Bill, which was introduced in another place on Thursday 16 November, includes provisions to reform the law on divorce.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary Lord Chancellor's Department what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1435]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The progress made towards cutting energy consumption in the Government buildings for which I am responsible, in each year since 1990, is as follows:

1990–91: base year

1991–92: + 1.30 per cent.

1992–93: – 3.93 per cent.

1993–94: – 3.98 per cent.

1994–95: – 4.30 per cent.

The total energy consumption savings in real terms to March 1995 in buildings for which I am responsible is 10.91 per cent.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services for small and medium enterprises. [1949]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1950]

Mr. Horam: The information is not held centrally and is available only at disproportionate cost.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Underground and (b) London Buses while on official business. [380]

The Deputy Prime Minister: None.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list all those in his office who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1424]

The Deputy Prime Minister: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. I have not, nor have others within the Office of Public Service, its immediate predecessors or executive agencies, signed public interest immunity certificates in relation to the Department or its executive agencies in the last five years.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list all those in his office who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1393]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister today.

HMSO

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to make a statement on the future of HMSO. [2127]

Mr Freeman: As I announced on 17 October, we are currently consulting the authorities in the House and the other place on the safeguards necessary for the future provision of printing and publishing services to Parliament. I also announced that I have appointed Coopers and Lybrand to examine the options for the future of HMSO with a view to privatisation, and I am awaiting its report. I will be making a further oral statement when we have reached a decision on the way forward, which I hope will be before the Christmas recess.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he has met personally the heads of agencies which report to him to discuss the work of those agencies. [3099]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 1 November, Official Report, column 318.

PRIME MINISTER

Remuneration

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister what considerations underlay the rates of remuneration of (a) members of police authorities and (b) members of health authorities and non-executive directors of trusts. [2234]

The Prime Minister: Remuneration reflects the duties and responsibilities of the individuals concerned.

Ministerial Statements

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Prime Minister if the statements made by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 20 November about the mentality of the Princess of Wales represented Her Majesty's Government's policy. [2409]

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend made it clear that he was speaking in a personal capacity.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if the statement made by the Minister of State for the Armed Forces subsequent to the television broadcast of the Princess of Wales represents the view of Her Majesty's Government. [2081]

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend made it clear that he was speaking in a personal capacity.

EU Finances

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what account he has taken of the Official Journal of the European Communities, C303, volume 38, for 14 November 1995 in determining Her Majesty's Government's policy. [2802]

The Prime Minister: I welcome the European Court of Auditors' annual report on the implementation of the 1994 budget published on 14 November. I believe that the court's reports are an important tool in improving the management of the Community's finances and I will continue to insist that the full account is taken of them.

Arms Exports

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on assessing the degree to which children have been involved in past conflicts in countries for which export licence applications for military equipment have been made. [2773]

The Prime Minister: We are committed to a responsible policy of defence equipment sales and routinely encourage other arms suppliers to observe similar responsibility in their own export policies. We take into account the human rights record of recipient states when considering applications for an export licence.

The United Kingdom is committed to promoting human rights worldwide.

Human Rights (Turkey)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what priority he will accord to the human rights record of Turkey in respect of its treatment of the (a) Assyrian, (b) Armenian and (c) Greek Christian minorities in determining whether to support Turkey's admission to the European Customs Union; [2577]

(2) if he will make a statement on his discussions in respect of the persecution of (a) Assyrian, (b) Armenian and (c) Greek Christian minorities in Turkey arising during his meeting with Prime Minister Tansu Ciller. [2576]

The Prime Minister: I did not specifically touch on the question of Christian minorities in Turkey with Prime Minister Ciller. We discussed the outlook for human rights in Turkey, and Mrs. Ciller assured me of her commitment to further reforms. We fully support the proposed Customs Union between the European Union and Turkey, and we hope to see it launched on schedule at the start of 1996.

Head of State

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has received regarding the constitutional position of the head of state. [2667]

The Prime Minister: I have received a number of representations on constitutional matters.

Asylum and Immigration Bill

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library copies of the letter sent to him by the statutory Newham police communities consultative committee dated 17 November concerning the proposed Asylum and Immigration Bill and his reply. [2689]

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Home Department has replied to the Newham police communities consultative committee.

Crown Estate

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister who owns the Crown Estate. [2242]

The Prime Minister: The Crown Estate is held in right of the Crown, but its income forms the major part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown that have been surrendered to the Exchequer in return for the civil list by each monarch since 1760. The Crown Estate is managed by Commissioners under the Crown Estate Act 1961. Copies of the Commissioners' annual reports are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what official valuation has been made of the Duchy of Cornwall estate. [2241]

The Prime Minister: Information on certain of the Duchy of Cornwall's capital assets is shown in the annual accounts presented to Parliament. The accounts for 1994, presented on 7 June 1995, HC 464 record the net sum as £86,913,196. Assets such as the unique Isles of Scilla have been in the estate for centuries and are regarded as inalienable; these and other long-held assets are not reflected in the figure. By charter and statute, the capital assets cannot be eroded. The Duchy Management Acts 1863–1982 make the Treasury responsible for the capital to generate income for future Dukes.

Crown Jewels

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the items which constitute the Crown Jewels. [2859]

The Prime Minister: By a strict definition the Crown Jewels are the objects used or worn by the Sovereign during the ceremony of the Coronation. The most famous of these are the Imperial State Crown, St. Edward's Crown and the Jewelled Sceptre. However, the expression Crown Jewels is used colloquially to cover the contents of the Jewel House at the Tower of London, an inventory of which is maintained by the royal collection.

Princess of Wales

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will make a statement on the constitutional implication of the views expressed by Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales about the possibility of her becoming Queen; [2080]

(2) if his statement of 9 December 1992, Official Report, column 845, that there is no reason why the Princess of Wales should not be crowned Queen in due course still represents Her Majesty's Government policy. [2079]

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to my statement of 9 December.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister what is the total estimated annual saving to business which will accrue in respect of the rules and regulations he identified for repeal in his answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 546. [2065]

The Prime Minister: In addition to the £40 million savings identified in my answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 546, further examples identified include: £30 million a year from simplification of trade marks legislation; £23 million a year from changes in the regime for the slaughter of poultry; £10 to 15 million a year from simplification of the procedures under the Companies Act 1985 for companies which have ceased to trade; cash flow savings of £75 million a year as a result of raising the threshold of the quarterly payment of PAYE and national insurance contributions from £450 per month to £600 per month. The total annual saving to business arising from all regulations identified for amendment or repeal is not available.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Prime Minister what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1953]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service.

TREASURY

Best Practice Guidelines

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish his Department's best practice guidelines for Government Departments. [1931]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury issues a great deal of best practice and other guidance in documents such as "Government Accounting", which is published by HMSO, and other guidance notes such as those produced by the Treasury's central unit on procurement.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the costs to public funds involved in preparing the cost benefit assessment contained in the explanatory memorandum for the Deregulation (a) Friendly Societies Act 1992, (b) Credit Unions and (c) Building Societies Orders 1995. [2022]

Mrs. Angela Knight: It is not practical to estimate the costs to public funds of preparing the assessments contained in the explanatory memoranda, because these, along with the other work involved in preparing the draft orders, were contained within the normal running costs of the Registry of Friendly Societies and the Treasury.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the annual saving to business which will accrue from the Deregulation (a) Friendly Societies Act 1992, (b) Credit Unions and (c) Building Societies Orders 1995. [2021]

Mrs. Knight: The estimated savings are included in the explanatory memoranda laid with the three draft orders. These will be significant in some areas, such as removing the requirement for a credit union to demonstrate the existence of a common bond. In others, savings will depend on the extent to which societies and credit unions take advantage of the benefits proposed. In addition, the changes will provide new opportunities for growth by giving institutions increased flexibility in their operations or greater freedom to expand their business.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1958]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury does not distinguish between different sizes of supplier: it seeks best value for money in procurement. The information requested, therefore, is not available.

Part-time Work and Job Sharing

Ms Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to alter (a) the national insurance and (b) the taxation systems to encourage (i) part-time work and (ii) job sharing. [2154]

Mr. Jack: The hon. Lady would not expect me to anticipate my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget statement.

Nigerian Military Regime

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what methods are available to him for assessing the value of the assets in Britain belonging to the Nigerian military regime; [2563]

(2) what methods are available to him for assessing the whereabouts and value of the financial accounts held in Britain belonging to the Nigerian military regime; [2564]

(3) if his Department has details of the value and number of personal accounts held in Britain by members of the Nigerian military regime; [2811]

(4) what is the value of the personal accounts and assets held in Britain by members of the Nigerian military regime. [2815]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Details of bank accounts are always kept confidential unless the authorities have reason to suspect the commission of a crime in the United Kingdom. We have no exchange controls and therefore cannot trace money flowing in and out of such accounts. Access to registers of assets such as shareholdings or property is the same as for any other holder of such assets.

Gardening Leave

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the grades of Treasury staff that qualified for gardening leave between 1993 and 1995 indicating the relevant salary bands for each year; [532]

(2) if he will list the number of staff on the grades qualifying for gardening leave for the periods mentioned in his answer of 2 November, Official Report, column 428, excluding any such staff on permanent secondment to other Departments. [973]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Staff do not qualify for "gardening leave". This term is used to cover those not working, but excluding those on statutory paid leave, maternity leave or long-term sick leave. It is Treasury policy to provide opportunities for temporary work for staff between postings whenever possible. This policy applies to staff at all grades but generally it affects only staff at grade 7 and below. The salary bands for these grades are published in the "Civil Service Management Code" which is available in the House of Commons Library. The Treasury staff in post figures for the periods requested are given in the table.

Her Majesty Treasury staff in post by quarter

Full-time equivalents

	1993	1994	1995
1 January	—	1,849	1,305
1 April	—	1,387	1,127
1 July	1,924	1,362	1,092
1 October	1,891	1,349	1,080

1. The table includes Forward, until it was privatised in February 1994.
2. The table excludes staff on loan to other Departments or on secondment but paid directly by outside organisations but includes staff on secondment that are paid by the Treasury and then reimbursed.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total number of his staff who served on gardening leave during 1994. [974]

Mrs. Knight: The total number of staff who were on "gardening leave"—those not working, but excluding those on statutory paid leave, maternity leave and long term sick leave—during 1994, was 23.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the average length of gardening leave periods undertaken in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995. [531]

Mrs. Knight: The average period of time on "gardening leave"—those not working, but excluding those on statutory paid leave, maternity leave or long term sick leave—was 20 weeks in 1994 and 18 weeks, until 1 October, in 1995.

Taxation

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what would be the cost, in respect of tax revenues forgone, of disregarding one-off payments for long-term care insurance from the current limits which apply to tax-free capital lump sums taken on retirement; [88]

(2) what would be the cost of making payments for long-term care insurance tax deductible; [89]

(3) what estimate he has made of the current cost of (a) men and (b) women of long-term care insurance bought in a one-off payment upon retirement. [171]

Mr. Jack: It would not be appropriate for me to comment on tax matters at this stage of the Budget cycle.

Mr. Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the direct revenue yield in a full year at 1995–96 levels of income from restricting (a) personal allowances, (b) relief from pension contributions and (c) other reliefs, to relief at 25, 20 and 15p, giving in each case the numbers of people affected. [82]

Mr. Jack: Estimated full-year yields at 1995–96 income levels based on a projection of the 1993–94 survey of personal incomes and other survey data in line with the assumptions in the summer economic forecast are given in the table. The figures do not take account of any behavioural effects which might result from the introduction of such changes, and show the yield from restricting each allowance or relief separately. If two or more were restricted the total yield would be greater than the sum of the individual figures.

£ million

	Basic Rate		Restriction to: 20 per cent.		15 per cent.
Effect of restricting	Yield	Numbers affected	Yield	Numbers affected	Yield	Numbers affected
(a) Personal allowances	1,400	3.2	5,700	26.1	10,600	27.9
(b) Relief for pension contributions	720	1.9	1,410	11.9	2,130	12.9
(c) Other reliefs	160	0.7	[1]n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a

[1] Information on reliefs given at source is not available from the survey of personal incomes so it is not possible to estimate the effect to restricting other reliefs to 20 per cent. or 15 per cent.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income tax was raised in the financial year 1978–79; and what percentage came from the top rate of income tax and from tax on investment income. [126]

Mr. Jack: The total income tax liability in 1978–79 is estimated to have been £20.3 billion. The other information requested is not readily available. Detailed analytical tables showing the distribution of incomes and of income tax were published in "The Survey of Personal Incomes 1978–79", a copy of which is in the library.

Mr. Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on the number of taxpayers in the financial year 1996–97 and on the number of higher rate taxpayers of (a) indexation, (b) raising the main personal allowances by five per cent. more than indexation, and (c) raising personal allowances by 10 per cent. more than indexation, giving figures separately for each main allowance and a total for main allowances. [81]

Mr. Jack: Estimates based on statutory indexation and with income levels projected to 1996–97 levels using the summer economic forecast are as follows.

Estimated number of income taxpayer 1996–97

Millions

	Total	Of which higher rate taxpayers
(a) Indexation	25.9	2.2
(b) (i) Increasing personal allowance for those aged under 65 by 5 per cent. more than indexation	25.6	2.2
(ii) Increasing personal allowance for those aged 65 or over by 5 per cent. more than indexation	25.7	2.2
(iii) Increasing all personal allowances by 5 per cent. more than indexation	25.5	2.2
(c) (i) Increasing personal allowance for those aged under 65 by 10 per cent. more than indexation	25.4	2.2
(ii) Increasing personal allowance for those aged 65 or over by 10 per cent. more than indexation	25.6	2.2
(iii) Increasing all personal allowances by 10 per cent. more than indexation	25.1	2.2

EU Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what proportion of that expenditure from the EC's 1994 budget which the Court of Auditors has qualified is attributable to the United Kingdom; [168]

(2) what proportion of that expenditure from the 1994 budget which the Court of Auditors qualified is attributable to fraud as against accounting errors by (a) each member state and (b) the Commission. [169]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The statement of assurance—SOA—published by the Court of Auditors on 14 November 1995 is global in nature. It does not seek to make an assessment of particular areas of spending nor does it seek to analyse accounting or other errors by member states or by the institutions of the Community. An explanatory memorandum on the SOA will shortly be deposited in Parliament.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people and what percentage of taxpayers in Lancashire are liable for inheritance tax on estates valued over (a) £160,000, (b) £200,000, (c) £300,000, (d) £400,000, (e) £500,000, (f) £1,000,000 and (g) £2,000,000. [1988]

Mr. Jack: I regret that this information is not available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the size of the United Kingdom labour force in each of the past five years; what were the activity rates for men and women during those years; and what were the numbers and proportion of self-employed. [1812]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Estimates for the United Kingdom from the labour force survey are shown in the tables following:

	Economically active (thousands)			Economic activity rate (percentage of all persons aged 16 and over)
Spring	All	Men	Women	All	Men	Women
1991	28,592	16,247	12,345	63.5	74.8	52.9
1992	28,581	16,187	12,395	63.1	73.8	53.0

1994	3,301	2,480	820	12.8	17.5	7.1
1995	3,355	2,544	811	12.9	17.7	7.0

Correspondence

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the letters to the hon. Member for North, Norfolk from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, dated 13 October 1993, reference cst.ps/dr/11mp12.10. [1669]

Mr. Waldegrave: A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

Fuel Duties

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will rearrange fuel duties to reduce the retail prices of the least polluting fuels for motor vehicles. [2145]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I cannot anticipate my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget statement.

Mortgage Dealers

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the regulatory bodies which oversee the work of firms which sell or offer advice on mortgages which do not include an investment element in them. [2320]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Bank of England supervises United Kingdom authorised banks; the Building Societies Commission supervises building societies. Credit institutions authorised in other members of the European Economic Area which provide services in the UK are supervised by their home state authorities.

Spirits Duty

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the excise duty receipts from spirits in each of the first six months of the present and the last tax year; [2140]

(2) if he has adjusted the forecast duty from spirits; [2142]

(3) if he will estimate the shortfall in estimated duty receipts from spirits for the current year. [2141]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The table shows spirit duty receipts for the first six months of 1995–96 were approximately 93 per cent. of revenues in the first six months of 1994–95. The outturn for the whole of 1994–95 was £1.776 billion.

HM Treasury's summer economic forecast contained a figure of £1.9 billion spirits receipts in 1995–96. The next set of forecasts will be published on Budget day in the 1996–97 "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

£ million

Month	1995–96	1994–95
April	112	126
May	106	128
June	129	134
July	121	122
August	115	121
September	128	134

This information is published every month by the Central Statistical Office in "Financial Statistics", table 2.1D.

Mr. Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Treasury model for tax on spirits was last adjusted. [2143]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The models used for spirits duty receipts are reviewed regularly.

Earnings Rates

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish hourly and weekly wage rates for 1992 and 1995 together with the percentage change between the two, according to data from the "New Earnings Survey" deflated by the retail prices index, for (a) full-time manual men on adult rates, (b) full-time non-manual men on adult rates, (c) full-time manual women on adult rates, (d) full-time non-manual women on adult rates and (e) full-time men and women on adult rates, giving the figures for 10th, 25th, 50th, 75th, and 90th percentiles and the mean in each case. [2324]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 24 November 1995]: The 10th, 25th, 50th, 75th and 90th percentiles and the mean for the categories requested are published in part A, table 1 of the "New Earnings Survey", for 1992 and 1995. To compare data for the two years in question the retail prices index, all items, should be used. This information is published in the "Central Statistical Office Business Monitor" MM23. Copies of the publications can be found in the Members' Library.

Interest Rates

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are current interest rates; what was the average for the period February 1974 to May 1979 and May 1979 to date; and if he will make a statement. [1489]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 23 November 1995]: The rate, measured by the clearing banks' base rate, is currently 6.75 per cent.

The average interest rate, represented by the Bank of England's minimum lending rate, between February 1974 and May 1979 was 10.53 per cent. From May 1979 to date minimum lending rate—or clearing bank base rate in periods when MLR was not posted—has averaged 10.92 per cent.

The rates for recent periods can be found in table 7.1J of the CSO's "Financial Statistics", a copy of which is in the Members' Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoner Statistics

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male and female prisoners were held by the Prison Service on (a) 27 May 1993 and on (b) 27 November 1995. [1084]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Paddy Tipping, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking how many male and female prisoners were held by the Prison Service on (a) 27 May 1993 and (b) 27 November 1995.

Figures for 27 May 1993 are not available. However, on 31 May 1993 there were 42,091 male and 1,494 female prisoners held by the Prison Service. Figures are not yet available for 27 November 1995. I will write to you again with these details as soon as they become available.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1948]

Mr. Howard: The information required to answer this question is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoner Repatriations

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to take decisions on application by detained Irish nationals to be repatriated to prisons in the Irish Republic; and if he will make a statement. [2427]

Miss Widdecombe: The Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons came into effect for the Republic of Ireland on 1 November 1995.

Under the convention, both jurisdictions, as well as the prisoner concerned, are required to consent to repatriation before any transfer can take place. Requests will be determined on their individual merits as and when information is available to all parties to enable informed decisions on consent to be made.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if those British citizens detained in prisons overseas who were received by the United Kingdom in the last five years, including those returned from America, were subject to remission and parole policies prevailing in the United Kingdom; [2429]

(2) how many British citizens detained in prison overseas who have applied to be repatriated to prisons in the United Kingdom have had their applications refused over the last five years to date; and if he will list the countries from which the applications were made. [2426]

Miss Widdecombe: Repatriation requires the consent of both jurisdictions and the prisoner concerned. Information is held only in cases where the United Kingdom withholds consent. In the last five years, one prisoner, a British national imprisoned in Canada, has been refused repatriation.

Under the terms of the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984 and the international agreements entered into by the United Kingdom for the repatriation of prisoners, the United Kingdom is responsible for administering the balance of a prisoner's sentence remaining to be served at the date of transfer. Repatriated prisoners are considered for release under the same rules which apply to other prisoners convicted here.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to take a decision on the transfer on compassionate grounds of Patrick Kelly and Michael O'Brien to prisons in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [2428]

Miss Widdecombe: The requests for transfer to Northern Ireland made by Patrick Kelly and Michael O'Brien were refused on 26 September. Their requests did not meet the criteria for transfer. They had no known links with Northern ireland and they were not previously resident there before their present convictions.

Their requests for transfer were, none the less, considered on an exceptional basis. It was not considered that sufficient compelling or compassionate grounds existed for allowing the transfers exceptionally.

Patrick Kelly has submitted fresh evidence in support of his request for transfer to Northern Ireland. This is currently under consideration. Mr. Kelly will be advised as soon as a decision has been made.

Dartmoor Prison

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how often the Governor of HM prison Dartmoor authorised the use of (a) bodybelts, (b) ankle straps, (c) handcuffs and (d) special segregation unit cells between January 1990 and the present date; [2092]

(2) on how many occasions since January 1990 prisoners in HM prison Dartmoor were kept in bodybelts for more than 12 hours. [2093]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. David Jamieson, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the use of restraints at Dartmoor prison.

Since January 1990, the governor of Dartmoor has authorised the use of a bodybelt on three occasions, once for 4 hours 45 minutes, once for 19 hours 5 minutes and once for 24 hours. The use of ankle straps has not been authorised during the period concerned.

Handcuffs are used routinely when escorting prisoners outside the secure perimeter of the prison to court or to another prison. They have only been used within the prison twice, on a prisoner who had staged a roof-top protest at another prison and had threatened to repeat the protest at Dartmoor. The governor decided that the prisoner would be handcuffed when moving from his cell to the visits area in order to reduce the possibility of him carrying out the threat.

The segregation unit special cells have been used on 331 occasions from January 1990 to date.

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) on how many occasions in the last five years from which figures are available inmates at Dartmoor prison have been (a) detained in a strip cell known as the box and (b) restrained by bodybelt for both medical and non-medical purposes; [2263]

(2) what is the (a) shortest, (b) longest and (c) average time during which inmates in Dartmoor prison are detained in a bodybelt or mechanical restraint. [2264]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Jean Corston, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the use of restraints at Dartmoor prison.

There are two special cells in the segregation unit at Dartmoor. They contain no furniture other than a low level plinth on which a prisoner may lie down and a small stool on which he may sit, both fastened to the floor of the cell. Since January 1991, the cells have been used on 281 occasions to locate prisoners who have exhibited behaviour which could result in them harming themselves or others. There have been two occasions since January 1991 when a prisoner at Dartmoor has been restrained in a bodybelt.

Since January 1990, the governor of Dartmoor has authorised the use of a bodybelt on three occasions, once for 4 hours 45 minutes, once for 19 hours 5 minutes and once for 24 hours. The use of ankle straps has not been authorised during the period concerned.

Drug Abuse (Prisons)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average number of disciplinary actions taken against prisoners for illegal drug use in each of the past five years. [2165]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the average number of disciplinary actions taken against prisoners for illegal drug use in each of the past five years.

Use of a controlled drug by prisoners in Prison Service establishments became a disciplinary offence in January 1995 under Prison and Young Offender Institution Rules. Provisional data for the period from January to October 1995 show that there have been 921 proved adjudications for this offence.

EC Measures

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many EC measures impose fines or other criminal penalties on people and businesses in the United Kingdom. [2091]

Miss Widdecombe: EC measures do not impose fines or other criminal penalties directly: they are implemented by means of United Kingdom law.

Information about criminal penalties imposed to comply with our EC obligations is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Immigration

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place a copy of Commissioner Gradin's proposals on immigration, asylum policy and border controls put to the recent meeting of the Justice and Home Affairs Council in the Library; and if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of these proposals. [2826]

Miss Widdecombe: The meeting of the Justice and Home Affairs Council at La Gomera on 14–15 October 1995 was an informal meeting and as such took no formal decisions. I have, however, provided a summary of the discussions to the Home Affairs Select Committee and the Select Committee on European Legislation.

During the meeting, Ministers considered the prospects for the third pillar of the treaty on European Union at the forthcoming intergovernmental conference. Commissioner Gradin expressed the view that immigration and asylum policy should be transferred into Community competence. She did not, however, put forward any formal proposals.

The Government do not share that view. We firmly believe that the matters dealt with under the third pillar, including immigration and asylum, should remain subject to intergovernmental co-operation. There was broad agreement with this position from other member states at La Gomera.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a Green Paper and a White Paper concerning current trends and problems in the fields of asylum and immigration and his proposals for legislation. [2690]

Miss Widdecombe: We have no plans to publish a Green Paper or a White Paper on these matters. The statement that my right hon. and learned Friend made to the House on 20 November identified a number of pressing issues requiring early action. Parliament will shortly have the opportunity to debate the Government's proposals for legislation.

Frontier Controls

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the European Commission's three proposed directives on the right to travel and the elimination of controls on persons crossing the internal frontiers of the European Union. [2828]

Miss Widdecombe: The Commission's proposals are not acceptable, as they conflict with our firm determination to maintain the United Kingdom's frontier controls with other member states of the European Union. Explanatory memoranda on the draft directives were laid on 12 October 1995.

Justice and Home Affairs Council

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who represented Her Majesty's Government at the meeting of the Justice and Home Affairs Council in the Canary Islands on 14 and 15 October. [2825]

Miss Widdecombe: The Government were represented at the informal Council in La Gomera by Mr. Timothy Walker, a deputy Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office and the United Kingdom delegate to the K4 committee.

Police Patrols

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has that beat patrolling by police constables has suffered as a result of greater emphasis on panda car patrols. [1673]

Mr. Maclean: There needs to be a balance between foot and mobile police patrolling to meet the operational requirements of individual forces and the communities which they serve. This is a matter for chief constables to decide.

Ms Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers are employed on the beat at any one time, per head of population. [1677]

Mr. Maclean: This information is not centrally collected. At the end of March 1995, 68,240 officers were deployed to patrol duties in England and Wales.

Private Security Industry

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will be in a position to respond to the first report of the Home Affairs Select Committee of Session 1994–95, HC 17, on the private security industry. [1674]

Mr. Maclean: The Government are looking in detail at the recommendations contained in the Select Committee report and will give a full response as soon as possible.

Ms Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about regulation of the private security industry. [1691]

Mr. Maclean: We have received a total of 16 representations in the last two months.

Vulnerable Prisoner Units

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of vulnerable prisoner units that exist in prisons in England and Wales; and if he will list these establishments. [1704]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about vulnerable prisoner units in prisons in England and Wales.

Vulnerable prisoner units, as distinct from segregated accommodation requiring controls under Prison Rule 43 or Young Offender Institution Rule 46, exist in 37 establishments as shown in the list annexed to this letter.

Prison Costs

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average annual cost per prison place. [1697]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the average annual cost of a prison place.

In 1993–94, the last year for which information has been published, the net operating cost per place per year was £22,712.

Police Force Statistics

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average annual change in the number of police officers in England and Wales between (a) 1974 and 1979, (b) 1980 and 1990 and (c) 1991 and 1995. [1678]

Mr. Maclean: The average annual increase in police strength was as follows:

	Number
(i) 1974 to 1979	+2,245 [1] officers
(ii) 1980 to 1990	+1,378 officers
(iii) 1991 to 1995 (March)	+31 [2] officers

[1] This includes an increase in actual police strength of 1,816 between May 1979 and December 1979.

[2] This figure obscures an average annual increase of 424 constables in this period, which has been achieved by a significant delayering of the police service's management structure.

Metropolitan Police

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of staff in the Metropolitan police are involved in (a) operational duties and (b) non-policing functions. [1679]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that all police officers are available for operational duties. Currently, 88.7 per cent. of police officers and 37.2 per cent. of civilian staff are allocated to operational duties, and 11.3 per cent. of police officers and 62.8 per cent. of civilian staff to non-operational support duties.

Prison Reports

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the additional costs of implementing the recommendations of the Woodcock and Learmont reports during 1995–96. [1682]

Miss Widdecombe: The implementation of the Woodcock report is expected to cost about £60 million in 1995–96. Whether the Prison Service will require additional provision to cover these costs will emerge in February 1996 at the time of the spring supplementary estimates. No additional expenditure is forecast in 1995–96 for the implementation of the Learmont report. The Prison Service is now considering General Sir John Learmont's recommendations in detail and until that work is completed the likely cost of implementation cannot be assessed.

Ms Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in implementing the recommendations of the Woodcock report. [1684]

Miss Widdecombe: The timetable for implementation of the recommendations made in the Woodcock report was published on 8 February. To date, 33 recommendations have been implemented and the remaining 31 have been implemented in part.

The majority of the recommendations not yet fully implemented require major construction work. A construction programme—which started with those prisons holding the highest categories of prisoners—is under way. That programme is currently being reviewed in the light of the recommendations in General Sir John Learmont's review of security across the Prison Service.

Remand Prisoners

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his current estimate of the average length of time for which remand prisoners are held prior to commencing trial. [1698]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking, what is his current estimate of the average length of time for which remand prisoners are held prior to commencing trial.

The available information is for the estimated average time in custody for untried prisoners. Figures for 1994 are given in the attached table.

Estimated average time spent in custody for untried prisoners, in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales in 1994[1] by sex

	Estimated average number of days in custody[3]
Type of custody	Male	Female
Untried[2]	59	44

[1] Provisional figures.

[2] Time spent in custody before conviction.

[3] Estimated from number of receptions and average population in 1994.

Sentencing Policy

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to publish a White Paper on sentencing. [1700]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to her on 26 October Official Report, column 755–56.

Prison Population

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his current estimate of the size of the prison population at 31 March 1995; [1688]

(2) how many prisoners he expects to be held in England and Wales by the end of the current financial year. [1694]

Miss Widdecombe: The latest projection, produced in October, is for the prison population in England and Wales on 31 March 1996 to be around 53,400. The population was projected from current trends and assumptions but past experience has shown the likelihood of unforeseen departures from the trend.

Ms Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what increase in the numbers of prisoners he expects to take place by the end of 1995. [1692]

Miss Widdecombe: The latest projection, produced in October, is for the prison population in England and Wales on 31 December 1995 to be around 50,000. This compares with a population of 52,410 on 22 November 1995. The December figure will be depressed in comparison to other months due to the seasonal downturn at the end of the year. The population was projected from current trends and assumptions but past experience has shown the likelihood of unforeseen departures from the trend.

COPEX Exhibition

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what police presence was provided at the COPEX exhibition at Sandown racecourse in November; and at what cost. [1640]

Mr Maclean: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that a total of 22 officers policed the COPEX exhibition at an estimated additional total cost of £1,050.00.

Prison Education Service

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what provision exists in the prison education system to cater for prisoners who (a) already have achieved and (b) have not achieved educational success. [397]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about what provision exists in the prison education system to cater for prisoners who (a) already have achieved and (b) have not achieved educational success.

A high proportion of prisoners have low educational attainments. Priority in prison education is therefore given to dealing with basic learning deficits. Adult basic education courses in literacy and numeracy are provided at all adult establishments and courses in English for speakers of other languages are provided where required. We are in the process of implementing a national core curriculum which emphasises adult basic education and social and life skills, English for speakers of other languages, information technology, and how to be an effective learner. In addition, courses are made available at the discretion of the individual governor in accordance with orders placed on the education provider (usually a college of further education) which holds the contract for that establishment.

There are opportunities for prisoners who wish to undertake advanced academic studies, including, in some cases, study for A Levels and enrolment as undergraduates with the Open University, or with other universities as external students.

Not all of the courses available to prisoners are geared towards academic or vocational success. Prisoners of all abilities can derive benefit from art and craft classes and activities, or distance learning materials obtainable through the education department for open and flexible learning. More advanced students may study for GNVQs and GCSE in various subjects and some establishments run vocational training and construction industry training courses, with opportunities to achieve National Vocational Qualifications.

Doncaster Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the use of HM prison Doncaster for immigration detainees is now a permanent arrangement; [479]

(2) who took the decision to hold immigration detainees in Doncaster prison; and on what date the decision was taken. [400]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the decision to hold immigration detainees in Doncaster prison and whether its use for that purpose is now a permanent arrangement.

The decision to use a unit in Doncaster prison for holding immigration detainees was taken in June 1994 and formally announced on 13 June 1994.

Because of population pressures and reservations subsequently expressed by the Immigration and Nationality Department of the Home Office as to its suitability for holding Immigration Act detainees, only limited use, on grounds of operational expediency, has been made of Doncaster for the holding of persons detained solely under the Immigration Act 1971. There are currently three such persons detained there. It has not been formally removed from the list of Prison Service establishments designated for the holding of such detainees but the Prison Service and the Immigration and Nationality Department are considering possible alternatives.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many detainees Doncaster prison holds at any one time; where the prison detainees are being held; what special facilities have been made available for the detainees; and what provisions there are in the contract signed in February 1994 between the Home Office and the contractor for this arrangement. [401]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about how many detainees Doncaster prison holds at any one time; where the prison detainees are being held; what special facilities have been made available for the detainees; and what provisions there are in the contract signed in February 1994 between the Home Office and the contractor for this arrangement.

There is no agreed number of detainees held in Doncaster. There are currently three detainees, detained solely under the Immigration Act 1971, held at Doncaster. Two are in normal accommodation and one, who is a paraplegic, in the Health Care Centre.

Detainees at Doncaster have access to the same facilities as other prisoners. There are no special facilities specifically for detainees.

The contract between the Home Office and Premier Prison Services (PPS) requires PPS to hold up to 771 prisoners at Doncaster. A prisoner is defined as "any person for the time being detained in legal custody as a result of a requirement imposed by a court or otherwise that he be so detained". This includes detainees.

Blakehurst Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list steps taken to implement each of the recommendations set out on pages 86 to 97 inclusive of Judge Tumim's inspection report on Her Majesty's prison Blakenhurst published on 1 February 1995 by (a) UK Detention Services Ltd. and (b) the Prison service. [386]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 27 November 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the Report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on Blakenhurst prison.

The attached note, a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House, gives details of the steps taken to implement each of the recommendations to the Director General of the Prison Service, the Prison Service area manager responsible for Blakenhurst and the Director of the establishment.

ANNEXE

Recommendations to the Director General

8.01 Deficiencies in meeting the contract should be addressed by all parties in particular as follows:

Examination of Contractor's financial records excluding prisoner earnings (Schedule 1.21 (v))
The Contract (Schedule 1, condition 21(v)) requires the contractor to keep books of account which are made available to inspection. The Contractor complied with the contract by making accounts available as and when requested.

Revision of Schedule 3 price (Schedule 1.21(iv))
Price revision is a commercial matter, subject to negotiation between the Contractor and the Prison Service, and dependent on consideration of the relevant indices issued by Central Statistical Office and their insertion in the price revision formula given in Schedule 3 of the contract. Both parties are complying with this procedure.

Progress reports (Schedule 1.36)
Progress reports have been supplied when requested by the Prison Service in full compliance with the contract. In addition regular meetings have been held between the Prison Service and UKDS, often with the on-site Prison Service Controller and the director of the prison present, to discuss progress as well as performance.

Identify specific records to be kept (Schedule 1.37)
Specific records have been identified and kept by the Contractor including maintenance schedules, prisoner damage reports, escorting and prisoner population records in full compliance with the contract.

Regular reviews of cleaning programme (Schedule 2.20)
A programme was agreed formally on 23 July 1993. Weekly reports are submitted to the Controller, together with frequent reviews held at minuted meetings.

Prisoner compacts (Schedule 2.69)
A system was drawn up and agreed between Contractor and Controller on 25 June 1993 and formally reviewed on 28 April 1994. When the inspection team visited the compact was not being used because of a failure in communication between two UKDS departments. The director put the system back into use during the inspection week.

Prisoners involved in decision making and methods of doing so (Schedule 2.72)
At the time of the inspection prisoners were members of the unit and food meetings, this continues but even more prisoner involvement is planned. This arrangement complies with the contract.

Consultancy/free telephone to Citizens Advice Bureau (Schedule 2.100)
The Citizens Advice Bureau offers a consultancy on Wednesday evenings. Free telephone calls are available house block senior custody officers. This meets the requirements of the contract.

Regime review (Schedule 2.118)
Since Blakenhurst was incorporated into the Prison Service line management in April 1994, regime monitoring has been fully implemented.

Commercial arrangements for prisoners' work (Schedule 2.121) and review of Business Plan (Schedule 2.121)
It has proved difficult for UKDS to generate much commercial work for prisoners because of the shortage of high grade "real wages" work appropriate for prisoners. At present this is offered in the Komatsu Shop, which refurbishes industrial machinery. The "real wage" system began on 21 November 1994 and involves a maximum of ten prisoners.

Continuing review and improvement of the induction/assessment policy (Schedule 2.130)
Revised induction/assessment is now in operation and fully meets the contract.

Contacts by prisoners with the community prior to release (Schedule 2.131)
The arrangements for resettlement have in the past been a cause for concern because the throughcare input lacked sufficient thrust and direction. This has been much improved with the arrival of a new senior probation officer and greater cooperation. The director/chief probation officer contract has been reviewed and action taken to revitalise weak areas. The area manager has requested additional throughcare proposals from UKDS.

Treatment programme for convicted sex offenders (Schedule 2.135)
Although the Contract refers to the national "core" programme, The Prison Service subsequently agreed that this was not appropriate for a local prison. The sex offender treatment programme at Blakenhurst is an assessment programme and the contractual wording has been amended to reflect that.

8.02 The contract document should be strengthened to take fuller account of offers made in the Contractor's tender submission (2.13)
The contractor is obliged by the contract to deliver the services in conjunction with, and in the spirit of, his tender. There would be some difficulty enforcing this—a weakness that has been rectified in subsequent contracts.

8.03 The amount of assistance which can appropriately be given to the Contractor by the Controller should be defined clearly (2.22)
HMCIP felt that the Controllers were taking too active a role in management. In the early days this was the case. But it has not fettered the Controllers' capacity to inspect and monitor. When the Area Manager took line responsibility in April 1994 the Controller's role was reviewed. New job descriptions for the Controller and his deputy were agreed on 4 May 1994. They meet the point made by the Inspectorate.

RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE AREA MANAGER

8.04 The extent of monitoring local financial information by the Controller and area manager should be reviewed.
Under the contract, UKDS receive a lump sum for running the prison. The Prison Service has no control over how this is spent as long as the contract is not breached in any way.

8.05 The monitoring of each part of the contract should be more methodical and records should be kept of the date on which each aspect is examined.
This formal monitoring is now being carried out.

8.06 Category D prisoners should not be held in secure accommodation.
Six category D prisoners are retained for special work places and all others have been transferred.

8.07 The director should receive copies of all relevant Prison Service instructions, advice to governors and information notices including copies of briefing papers.
This is now done.

8.08 A shower should be provided in the kitchen for the inmate work party.
This is still under consideration by the director.

8.09 Consideration should be given to providing a secure treatment room on the ground floor of the hospital and one in the vulnerable prisoner unit.
This recommendation was considered but rejected by the director.

8.10 The Prison Service should take back unwanted class 1 locks and reimburse the contractor for those not used.
This has been done.

8.11 An emergency exit door should be provided in the education department leading from either the glass engraving or the cookery rooms to the outside walkway.
Automatic closures have been fitted to the door as recommended in the fire safety report of June 1993.

8.12 Technical advice should be sought about the effect of the screening of the vulnerable prisoner spur on the airflow in the event of a fire.
Advice has been received and is being considered.

8.13 Privacy screening should be provided around the bath in reception.
This has been done.

8.14 The facilities in the vulnerable prisoner unit should be upgraded to overcome the claustrophobic atmosphere and provide a proper servery, adequate storerooms and offices, and opportunities for more activities.
A storeroom has been provided together with an improved trolley system. The other recommendations were rejected on cost grounds.

8.15 Equipment required by the optician and physiotherapist should be supplied.
The equipment has been supplied.

8.16 The alarm system for the hospital should be reviewed.
This has been done and the appropriate action taken.

8.17 The use of the special medical room should be reviewed in comparison with other local prisons.
This is now being done.

8.18 The security of the treatment/dispensing room should be improved.
The security of the doors has been improved.

8.19 An ultrasonic instrument cleaner should be supplied for the dentist.
This has now been supplied.

8.20 There should be a doctor's consulting suite on the VP unit with a properly equipped doctor's interview room and a separate treatment room.
This is not required. Prisoners from the VPU attend the health care centre for interviews and treatment.

Racially Motivated Crime

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a breakdown of the numbers of racially motivated crimes reported over the last 15 years for each police authority in the United Kingdom. [1530]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 24 November 1995]: The available information relates to reported racial incidents in England and Wales since 1989 and has been provided by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. The figures for 1994–95 will be published shortly. Figures for Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for the Secretary of State in each Department.

[1] Financial year data. Some of the increase in total reported incidents in 1993–94 may be attributable to the implementation of a precise definition of a racial incident when included in the Police Service Performance Indicator Suite.

[2] Adjusted figure (due to a change in classification criteria) from that given in the Official Report (24 June 1994, Column 330).

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Executive Agencies

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list for his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by agency staff (a) the costs of the travel, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff concerned. [2286]

The Attorney-General: The one executive agency for which I am responsible is Government Property Lawyers. No member of staff of the agency travelled overseas in an official capacity in the financial year 1994–95.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Attorney-General what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1942]

The Attorney-General: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [2831]

The Attorney-General: The Solicitor-General took through the House of Commons the Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1995 which effected the repeal of certain obsolete and unnecessary local enactments. Subject to this, no Acts of Parliament affecting local government have been introduced by my Department since January 1994.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1428]

The Attorney-General: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. Any claim relating to my own department would be made by me or, in my absence, the Solicitor-General. I am also responsible for three departments headed by a statutory officer holder: the Director of Public Prosecutions, the director of the Serious Fraud Office and the Treasury Solicitor. They may make a public interest immunity claim relating to their departments, after consultation with me. The following claims have been made inter partes. The director of the Serious Fraud Office made a claim in 1994, by affidavit, to preserve the confidentiality attaching to documents and information relating to the internal decision making process of the SFO.

In addition, I am aware of two certificates used in 1991 and 1992 in proceedings in Northern Ireland. Both were signed by my predecessor and were intended to preserve the confidentiality attaching to exchanges between the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland and the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Lockerbie

35. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will set up a Select Committee to examine the circumstances of the destruction of Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie. [682]

Mr. Newton: As I told the hon. Gentleman in my answer to his similar question on 23 October 1995, Official Report, column 458, there are no plans to do so.

Members' Pay

38. Mr. Steen: To ask the Lord President of the Council when he plans to review hon. Members' pay. [685]

Mr. Newton: As I indicated in the debate on ministerial salaries on 26 October, Official Report, column 1191, my aim is to maintain arrangements under which hon. Members' pay can be increased annually in a fair and sensible way, without the need for annual debate.

Trade Union Sponsorship

39. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Lord President of the Council when the Privileges Committee last examined the relationship between an hon. Member and any trade union sponsorship applicable to that Member. [688]

Mr. Newton: The function of the Committee of Privileges, which is to be replaced by the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges, is to consider matters of complaint of breach of privilege referred to them by the House.

Complaints relating to trade union sponsorship have been referred to the Committee on a number of occasions. The most recent report of the Committee relating to such a complaint is the first report from the Committee of Session 1990–91—House of Commons Paper No. 420—which contains details of earlier cases.

Legislation (Scrutiny)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Lord President of the Council what consideration he has given to including departmental Select Committees in the procedures for the scrutiny of legislation. [687]

Mr. Newton: None, but my hon. Friend may wish to draw the matter to the attention of the Procedure Committee.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Lord President of the Council what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1434]

Mr. Newton: The Privy Council Office is housed within the Cabinet Office estate. I accordingly refer the hon. Member to the reply given on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey, (Mr. Ainsworth) on 17 May 1995, Official Report, column 2600.

Drugs Information

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Lord President of the Council what plans he has to distribute the leaflet, "Tackling Drugs Together: Information for Parents, Businesses and Communities"; and when the distribution will take place. [1500]

Mr. Newton: Over 5,000 copies of the leaflet, which is intended to involve local communities in the Government's strategy to tackle the misuse of drugs, have already been sent to the 105 drug action teams which have recently been set up across England, in accordance with the White Paper "Tackling Drugs Together". Copies have also been placed in the Library of the House.

The drug action teams are determining the distribution arrangements for the leaflet in the light of their local knowledge and developing plans to engage their communities—including parents and businesses—in tackling local drugs problems. Some drug action teams are, for example, planning to distribute the leaflet to all GP surgeries.

WALES

Air Pollution

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions air pollution levels have exceeded recommended official Government levels in each county and for Wales as a whole, in each of the last three years for which information is available; and if he will make a statement. [470]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There are currently four European directives on air quality which set mandatory and non-mandatory limits for lead, sulphur dioxide and suspended particles, nitrogen dioxide and ozone levels in the air.

In the last three years the relevant thresholds were breached at Government monitoring sites in Wales as follows:

Limit	Site	Number of Exceedences 1992	1993	1994
Taken on a daily basis:
Ozone information threshold	Aston Hill	3 days	1 day	1 day
	Cardiff	2 days	—	1 day
Taken on an annual basis:
Guide value for SO_2	Cwmgwrach	Exc.	—	—
	Port Talbot	Exc.	—	—
	Glynneath	Exc.	Exc.	Exc.
Taken on an annual basis:
Guide value for suspended particles	Wrexham	—	Exc.	—

Exc.= Exceeded the Guide values, based on the average daily readings taken over the year.

Further information is available in the environmental digest for Wales and the report "Air Pollution in the UK 1993–94", copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Emergency Hospital Beds

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to require each NHS trust to publish information regarding the frequency of closure of admittance to emergency hospital beds. [638]

Mr. Richards: I have no such proposals, but I would expect trusts to make this information available locally on request.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the frequency of the closure of admittance to emergency hospital beds, expressing the number of beds so closed as a proportion of the total number of hospital beds and indicating the percentage increase or decrease, in each case, for each NHS trust and for Wales as a whole for the last two years for which information is available. [898]

Mr. Richards: Operational information of this kind is not held centrally.

Out-of-town Superstores

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will list all out-of-town superstores (a) for which planning applications were made and (b) for which planning consent was granted since 1990, indicating the dates; and if he will make a statement. [1085]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This information is not collected centrally.

Correspondence

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if it is the policy of his Department for Ministers to reply to hon. Members' letters in the language requested by those hon. Members. [1767]

Mr. Hague: If an hon. Member requests that we reply in Welsh or in English we will comply with that request.

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2039]

Mr. Hague: My Department has been responsible for promoting a small number of Bills in the last five years. None contains provision for statutory repeal or review.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1959]

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not held centrally.

Dry Stone Walls

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what (a) grants and (b) other support will be available from his Department for the conservation and protection of dry stone walls from April 1996. [2328]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Grants for the restoration, conservation and protection of dry stone walls are available from the Welsh Office in those parts of Wales which are designated as environmentally sensitive areas and those areas which come under the Tir Cymen pilot scheme administered by the Countryside Council for Wales. Support under these schemes will continue beyond April 1996.

Assistance towards the provision, replacement or improvement of walls is also available throughout Wales under the farm and conservation grant scheme which is currently due to end on 19 February 1996. I have asked my officials to investigate the possibilities that may exist to enable the continuation in Wales of grant aid for capital works—including dry stone walling—that are available under the scheme. We shall make an announcement in due course.

SCOTLAND

Hospital Closures

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many closure proposals are currently being submitted by NHS trusts and boards with regard to long-term stay in Scotland; and if he will list the hospitals targeted for closure. [1272]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have approved the closure of Gartloch, Woodilee, Gogarburn, Broomhill and Lochmaddy hospitals. All will remain open until such time as the planned reprovision of accommodation and services are in place and available.

Proposals affecting Lochgreen, Lennos Castle, Craig Dunain and Eastbank hospitals have been submitted by the respective health boards for my consideration.

Closure proposals are a matter for the health boards. Before they are presented for my decision the health boards must conduct a public consultation exercise in every case. On receipt of closure proposals I look for confirmation that genuine consultations have taken place; that the reprovision arrangements are appropriate; and that the health board has agreed its proposals with the local social work and housing authorities.

District Nurses and Health Visitors

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the numbers of district nurses and the numbers of health visitors employed in Scotland, broken down by real frequency and whole-time equivalents for the years between 1988 and 1995 inclusive. [1269]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is set out in the tables.

Notes:

[1] Data from September 1991 are derived using a new occupation classification for nursing staff. This may have caused some discontinuities in the time series as previous misclassifications have been corrected.

[2] Data at 31 March 1995.

[3] The figures for health visitors and district nurses include some staff without an HV or DN qualification working in these fields, probably in a supporting role.

[4] Health visitors with combined duties including district nursing and vice versa are included under both categories in the table. (i.e., double counted).

[5] Data at 30 September 1988 include some qualified nurses working in the community but not necessarily as district nurses. In subsequent years these nurses have been reclassified.

Notes:

[1] Data from September 1991 are derived using a new occupation classification for nursing staff. This may have caused some discontinuities in the time series as previous misclassifications have been corrected.

[2] Data at 31 March 1995.

[3] The figures for health visitors and district nurses include some staff without an HV or DN qualification working in these fields, probably in a supporting role.

[4] Health visitors with combined duties including district nursing and vice versa are included under both categories in the table. (i.e. double counted).

[5] Data at 30 September 1988 include some qualified nurses working in the community but not necessarily as district nurses. In subsequent years these nurses have been reclassified.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for his Department in 1993–94. [1915]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. The Scottish Office does not have policy responsibility for Community R and D expenditure and makes no direct contribution to the R and D budget.

Criminal Appeals

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in each of the past four years the Lord Advocate has appealed a sentence passed on conviction on indictment which he is considered to be (a) unduly lenient and (b) wrong in law; of such appeals, how many led to the imposition of heavier sentences and how many were found to be wrong in law; and if he will make a statement. [1086]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In terms of section 228A(a) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 the Lord Advocate was given the power to appeal against a sentence imposed in respect of an indictment on the ground that it is considered by him to be unduly lenient. This provision came into force on 1 October 1993. To date the power has been exercised as shown in the table.

There have been no appeals by the Lord Advocate thus far in terms of section 228A(b) on a point of law.

Procurators Fiscal

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what procurator fiscal staff and services are currently in Arbroath; and when he intends to fill any vacancies; [2333]

(2) what were the numbers and locations of procurator fiscal staff in each Angus sheriffdom in each of the past five years; [2331]

(3) what consultations he has had and he intends having before finalising decisions about changes in the procurator fiscal system in Angus and Scotland; [2332]

(4) when he intends to appoint a procurator fiscal based in Arbroath. [2330]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There were four staff in the Forfar procurator fiscal's office between 1991 and 1993, and from 1994 to date there have been three. There are five staff in the procurator fiscal's office in Arbroath. There has been no change in the staffing level there in the last five years. The holder of the office of procurator fiscal, Arbroath, transferred to the procurator fiscal's office in Glasgow on 23 November 1995, and the procurator fiscal, Dundee, has been appointed procurator fiscal, Arbroath, ad interim.

The Lord Advocate is presently giving consideration to the future arrangements for staffing the Arbroath and Forfar offices. In the event that he proposes any change from previous arrangements which would have significant implications, he will consult relevant interests.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of business undertaken by the procurator fiscal service in Arbroath in each of the past five years. [2235]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The following table shows the number of reports received by the procurator fiscal from the police and other reporting agencies for the years 1990 to 1995, and gives details of court proceedings.

Procurator fiscal's office, Arbroath

	Total reports received	Solemn Pleas	Courts trials	Summary pleas	Courts trials

Dry Stone Walls

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what (a) grants and (b) other support will be available from his Department for the conservation and protection of dry stone walls from April 1996. [2327]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Grant assistance for dry stone walling works in Scotland is available from the following sources:

Objective 1 highlands and islands agricultural programme (agricultural business improvement scheme): 70 per cent. grant for dyking works on inbye and hill land, and for the provision of dykes to exclude livestock in association with conservation management;

Crofting counties agricultural grants scheme (Scottish Crofting Counties only): 55 per cent grant for the provision, substantial alteration, restoration and protection of dry stone walls for agricultural purposes;

Scottish Natural Heritage: grants up to a maximum rate of 50 per cent. for dry stone walling works which improve the character and attractiveness of the landscape, and contribute to conservation of biodiversity.

The Government have no current plans to withdraw assistance under these schemes. Grants at the rate of 30 per cent.—within less-favoured areas—and 25 per cent.—outwith less-favoured areas—are currently available in Scotland under the farm and conservation grant scheme, national. However, the legislation governing this scheme is due to expire in February 1996. We are currently considering future arrangements.

Depending on the nature of their management agreements, farmers in environmentally sensitive areas in Scotland can receive payments at varying rates, depending on location, for dry stone walling works. It is likely that this form of support will also continue beyond April 1996.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many contracts have been awarded by him to the consultancy firm PIEDA in the past 10 years: at what cost and on what subjects. [1224]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 22 November 1995]: Detailed information about all consultancy contracts let by my Department is not maintained centrally and a full reply could be provided only at a disproportionate cost. However, two surveys were carried out by my Department in February 1994 and August 1995 from which the following contracts have been identified:

1990–91

Appraisal of business plans

Aerial surveillance operations

1991–92

Housing initiative survey

Interim evaluation of Strathclyde integrated development operation Highlands and island interim evaluation of national programme of community interest.

1992–93

West Nerston retail impact study

Stirling Castle visitors centre study

1993–94

Evaluation of the crofters building grants and loans scheme

1994–95

Staffing and organisational review of sea fisheries inspectorate evaluation of the crofters building grants and loans scheme

1995–96

Staffing and organisational review of sea fisheries inspectorate Financial management review of Scottish Homes

Information on costs is available in relation to the work carried out in 1994–95 and 1995–96 when contracts awarded were valued at a total of £92,500.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what performance targets are set for the Scottish ambulance service for non-emergency calls. [1226]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [Holding answer 22 November 1995]: Non-emergency patients are taken to routine hospital appointments by the patient transport service provided by the Scottish Ambulance Service NHS trust. This service is purchased by NHS trusts to standards which are sensitive to local circumstances and are agreed as part of the contracting process. To monitor performance and identify possible improvements, each division of the Scottish Ambulance Service NHS trust conducts an annual patient satisfaction survey. In addition the accident and emergency service provided by the Scottish Ambulance Service NHS trust also deals with calls classified by general practitioners or other health care workers as urgent. In such cases the target is for 95 per cent. of patients to arrive at hospital no later than 15 minutes after the time agreed with the caller, this is typically one to two hours but is determined by the caller's assessment of the patients clinical need.

DEFENCE

Bosnia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the further deployment of British troops to the former Yugoslavia as part of the international peace plan. [2446]

Mr. Portillo: Contingency planning for a NATO-led force to help implement a peace agreement on Bosnia is well advanced. Britain will make a significant contribution.

Final decisions on the British contribution, and on the time scale of deployment, cannot be taken yet. They depend on the satisfactory outcome of a number of important issues, including signature of the peace agreement by the parties and equitable burden sharing among our allies. Details of the various national contributions to the force, including those from non-NATO countries, remain under discussion with NATO. The commitment of substantial US ground forces will be a pre-requisite for the involvement of our own forces. NATO plans to withdraw the force within 12 months.

Current planning envisages British forces operating in central and western Bosnia, with the headquarters located at Gornji Vakuf, in our present area of operations. In addition, we plan to contribute our existing sea and air assets in theatre, although we would expect our maritime forces to reduce as the embargoes are lifted.

The NATO operation will be run on the ground by the headquarters of NATO's ACE Rapid Reaction Corps, for which we have the lead alliance responsibility. That means that the United Kingdom will provide the commander, General Sir Michael Walker, and about 60 per cent. of the staff.

On top of that we are considering deploying a divisional headquarters—3 UK Division—and a brigade with armour, infantry and artillery elements, under Headquarters 4 Armoured Brigade, together with a number of supporting units.

The forces will incorporate units from our UN contingent already in Bosnia. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said on 22 November, Official Report, column 667, we expect the total land force contribution to be of the order of 13,000.

Such a force is bound to involve the United Kingdom in greater expense than would have been the cost to us from continuing with our role in UNPROFOR, but those extra costs cannot yet be calculated with accuracy.

Along with the forces from other NATO countries, including the US, it will probably be necessary to pre-position a number of personnel to prepare for the deployment of the main forces who will follow as soon as possible after the final signature of a peace agreement. The notice to move all units which may be involved in the deployment as a whole is being reviewed and will be reduced as necessary.

Indonesian Pilots (Training)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the pilots of the Indonesian Air Force have been trained at any of the RAF flying schools in the United Kingdom; and, if so, if he will give the numbers of pilots, the years, and the bases at which such training took place. [902]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 6 November, Official Report, column 595.

Procurement Executive, Abbey Wood

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the compliance with value for money requirement of his Department's Abbey Wood procurement executive headquarters. [2444]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Abbey Wood project has been assessed against value-for-money criteria at all stages since its inception. Two investment appraisals in 1991 justified the selection of Bristol as the location and Abbey Wood as the site for collating the procurement executive. The late 1992 IA, which reappraised alternative accommodation solutions, justified the decision to proceed with the Abbey Wood construction programme. Subsequent appraisals in 1993 assessed the impact of taxation of relocation allowances, and the implementation of changes in management of the common user estate.

During the 1994 defence costs study, 27 options including the base case were appraised to reconsider the cost-effectiveness of the Abbey Wood project in the light of anticipated reductions in the size of the procurement executive headquarters organisation. IAs have been scrutinised within the Department, by the Treasury at each major approval stage, and by the National Audit Office.

Value engineering has been applied extensively during the development of the design, resulting in some £27 million being saved in acquisition costs compared with less well optimised schemes. Life cycle costing techniques have been applied to inform major design decisions, with investment appraisals being conducted on design options, resulting in energy efficient and low maintenance cost solutions. Construction contracts have been subject to competition, and proposals evaluated against value for money criteria, taking account of risk assessment.

The cost-effectiveness of options proposed by tenderers were assessed in terms of both capital and life cycle costs, and adopted where better value for money would result. Space standards have been subject to two strategic reviews, resulting in tauter space standards being adopted. A strict configuration control regime has been in force to minimise cost variances arising from changes, yet allowing potential additional savings to be evaluated.

Planning for a comprehensive post-project evaluation has been initiated to enable the overall cost-effectiveness of the collocation of the PE to be assessed upon completion of the project.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the working area per square metre for each person at his Department's procurement executive headquarters at Abbey Wood. [2441]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Within the Abbey Wood headquarters office buildings, the basic work space allocation for each employee is:

	Metre^2
All staff up to, and including grade 6	6.75
Staff at grade 5 and grade 4	13.00
Staff at grade 3 and above	27.00

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current total estimated cost for the railway and station at Filton being built to service his Department's Abbey Wood procurement executive; and what was the original total estimated cost of the railway and station. [2443]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The current estimated cost of the new Filton Abbey Wood station which is being built for Avon county council to serve all the new and existing developments in the area is £885,000. The original estimated cost was £1.056 million.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's estimate of the number of employees at his Department's Abbey Wood procurement executive headquarters who will use the railway station on the site each day. [2445]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Surveys conducted within the procurement executive indicate that over 500 staff are likely to use Filton Abbey Wood railway station each day.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the procurement executive were expected to occupy the Abbey Wood procurement executive headquarters when the scheme was first announced; and how many people employed by the procurement executive are now expected to occupy the building. [2450]

Mr. Arbuthnot: When the scheme was first announced, the planning assumption for PE HQ numbers to be accommodated at Abbey Wood was 4,800 plus a further 500 PE project related and integrated logistics support staff.

Current plans envisage 4,300 plus a further 600 PE project related and integrated logistics support staff.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people were employed in the procurement executive in each of the last three years; and what is his Department's estimate of the numbers to be employed in each of the next five years. [2451]

Mr Arbuthnot: The numbers of staff directly employed—military and civilian—in each of the last three years were:

1 April 1993: 11,230

1 April 1994: 10,760

1 April 1995: 7,540

During the financial year 1994–95 some 3,070 test and evaluation staff were transferred to the Defence Research Agency.

The estimated numbers of staff to be employed to meet the anticipated programme requirement in future years, rounded, are:

1 April 1996: 6,600

1 April 1997: 6,350

1 April 1998: 6,200

1 April 1999: 6,050

1 April 2000: 5,850

(excluding Ministry of Defence police employed to support the nuclear contract programme).

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when final planning permission was granted for the Abbey Wood procurement executive headquarters; what is the total size of the site; how many lakes have been built on the site; what is the size of the lakes on the site; if the lakes are stocked with fish; what is the purpose of the suspension bridge situated over one of the lakes; what has been the cost of landscaping the Abbey Wood site; and how many trees were planted as part of the landscaping. [2447]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Detailed planning permission for the Abbey Wood headquarters was granted in March 1993. The total size of the site is 98 acres. One lake has been built on the site, with a surface area of 22,000 m^2 to satisfy National Rivers Authority requirements to contain storm water run-off and prevent flooding of surrounding waterways. Four small ponds, with a total surface area of 600 m^2 are integrated into the landscape scheme to satisfy local planning authority requirements for maintaining wildlife corridors and enhancing the ecology of the local area. There are no plans to stock the water features with fish.

Site planning obligations, suitability of land for buildings, and on-site road infrastructure requirements to access car parks and neighbouring land dictated that land to the north-east of the site had to be annexed from the main development, and used for vehicle parking. The bridge provides pedestrian access to the north-east car park, whilst satisfying security requirements. The estimated cost of soft landscaping is £5 per sq m for a total area of 270,000 m^2. Once complete, some 5,000 trees will have been planted as part of the landscape scheme which life cycle costing has shown to be more cost effective in terms of upkeep than grass.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, when he expects to name a new head of the procurement executive. [2448]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I expect to name a new head of the procurement executive in early 1996, as a result of the open competition which is currently under way.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who is the prime contractor for the building of the procurement executive at Abbey Wood. [2449]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The main contractor for the shell and core construction of the buildings at Abbey Wood is John Mowlem Construction plc.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current total cost of staff relocation to his Department's Abbey Wood procurement executive headquarters; what this cost was when the project was first announced; and what are these costs per person. [2454]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Taking account of the post defence costs study restructuring of the procurement executive HQ organisation, the current estimated total cost of relocation of staff to Abbey Wood is £74.5 million. At current economic conditions, and allowing for the changes in taxation of relocation costs announced in March 1993, the original estimated total cost of staff relocation when construction of Abbey Wood was approved was £86.2 million. The current estimated average cost per head is some £22,000. The original estimated average cost per head has been calculated at some £24,000.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been his Department's estimates in respect of the total cost of the new procurement executive headquarters at Abbey Wood in each of the last four years. [2455]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The estimated works cost of the Abbey Wood development in each of the last four financial years—inclusive of site acquisition, construction, fitting out, professional works management fees and VAT—has remained within its approved budget of £248.5 million at 1992 prices—£273.4 million at 1995 prices.

Drugs (Army Personnel)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many drug tests have been carried out by his Department on the Army since the testing scheme was introduced; how many soldiers have been tested for drugs in this period; how many have failed the drug tests; and if he will provide a breakdown by regiment. [2595]

Mr. Soames: As of 15 November 1995, 16,968 Army personnel have been tested. To date, 133 have failed the test and results are awaited for a further 328 tests. The units tested are as follows—some of these have been tested more than once:

Hawk Aircraft (Indonesia)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of Hawk aircraft sold to the Indonesian Government for use by the Indonesian Air Force. [903]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As has previously been confirmed, the Indonesian Air Force purchased 20 Hawk trainer aircraft in the early 1980s. In 1993 a further order was placed for an additional 24 aircraft which have not yet been delivered.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish details in the Official Report of the number of sales of Hawk trainer aircraft for each of the last available five years, indicating which countries purchased the aircraft and what numbers. [901]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is not normal Government practice to reveal details of specific exports. These matters are confidential between the customer and the supplier.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1943]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Dwellings

Mr. David Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many dwellings owned by his Department are (a) currently unoccupied and (b) have been unoccupied for six months or more in the counties of (i) Mid-Glamorgan and (ii) Gwent. [2164]

Mr. Soames: As at 30 September 1995 my Department owned 124 vacant dwellings in Gwent, of which 116 were being held for a unit deployment due to commence in December and eight were in the process of being sold. A total of 122 of these dwellings had been vacant for more than six months. My Department owned no vacant dwellings in Mid-Glamorgan.

Flying Training

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what were the dates of arrival and departure of Royal Air Force aircraft deployed to Goose bay for flying training in the 1994 season; [1277]

(2) what were the dates of arrival and departure of Royal Air Force aircraft deployed to Goose bay for flying training in the 1995 season. [1313]

Mr. Soames: Royal Air Force aircraft were deployed to Goose bay for flying training as follows:

	1994	1995
Hercules	13–17 March	23–28 January
Tornado GR1	14 April–27 June	6 July–27 September
	1 August–26 September	—

Private Finance Initiative

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the private finance initiative was not considered for the development of his Department's Naval Support Command at Foxhill, Bath. [2442]

Mr. Soames: The scope for a private finance initiative approach to the overall NSC accommodation requirement was considered before the proposals were announced but was not pursued since it was considered unlikely to provide value for money. Proposals to accommodate the NSC HQ at Ensleigh, Bath and at Abbey Wood, Bristol were announced on 14 June 1995. Subsequently, proposals for a PFI solution involving the Foxhill site were put forward by Bath city council in July and August 1995. These proposals were carefully examined. When they were adjusted to meet the NSC requirement, they did not offer better value for money than the planned way ahead which was subsequently confirmed on 6 September.

Low Flying

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints he has received from Northumberland about tactical low-flying sorties over the area in the past five years. [2723]

Mr. Soames: The number of complaints and inquiries about military low flying received by my Department from Northumberland over the past five years are as follows:

1991: 111
1992: 220
1993: 180
1994: 160
1995: 142[1]

[1] Up to 31 October 1995.

Portland Naval Base

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Serious Fraud Office has contacted his office concerning the sale of Portland naval base; and if he will make a statement. [2694]

Mr. Soames: The Serious Fraud Office contacted my Department on 19 October 1995. All complaints referred to the SFO are subject to a process known as vetting so that the SFO's decision about whether or not to accept the case is properly based on the facts available at the time of the decision. The complaint in this case is at that stage.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the compliance with the correct procedures in respect of the sale of Portland naval base to Portland Port Ltd. [2692]

Mr. Soames: I am completely satisfied that the correct procedures have been adopted in respect of the sale of Portland naval base following a review of the case by my senior officials and the National Audit Office.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department signed a contract with Portland Port Ltd. concerning the Portland naval base. [2691]

Mr. Soames: A contract has not yet been signed with Portland Port Ltd. We are at an advanced stage in finalising the details of the sale contract, which has inevitably been subject to a very complex legal negotiation. When all outstanding issues are finally resolved contracts for sale will be exchanged.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what considerations apart from the bidding price his Department took into account when evaluating bids for the purchase of Portland naval base. [2693]

Mr. Soames: Many factors were taken into account in selecting a purchaser including the availability and source of funding; employment projections; conformity with local aspirations; credibility of the proposed use; short, medium and long-term proposals for use; environmental issues; planning and other necessary consents.

Drugs Tests (Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when a drugs test was last carried out on the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders; how many soldiers were tested; how many (a) officers and (b) other ranks failed the test; what actions have been taken against those failing; and if he will make a statement. [2594]

Mr. Soames: A random drugs test was conducted on the 1st Battalion Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders on 31 October 1995. Three hundred and ninety two all ranks were tested of which no officers tested positive, but 22 other ranks did. The commanding officer will consider each of the soldier's cases on their merits before recommending to retain or discharge them.

Expenditure Plans

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent savings in the equipment budget are being delivered by deferment of projects. [2452]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Our new expenditure plans will be published tomorrow. This Government remain committed to maintaining and enhancing the front-line capabilities of the armed forces, and to providing the support needed to enable them to carry out their wide range of tasks.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent the expenditure profile has been modified to take account of deferments in (a) capital project and (b) equipment projects. [2453]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We will be publishing our forecast of expenditure for this financial year as part of the Budget day announcements tomorrow.

Surplus Vessels

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 21 November, Official Report, columns 64–66, if he will list the countries to which the surplus vessels were sold; and what were the values of the contracts. [2695]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Vessels from the list given in my earlier answer were sold to: Chile, Ecuador, Lebanon, Indonesia, Portugal, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Brazil and India, although the vast majority were sold to the United Kingdom commercial market.

The values of the contracts are commercially confidential and could be released only with the permission of the purchasers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Child Care Facilities

32. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission when he expects comprehensive child care facilities to be available in the House. [675]

Mr. Beith: Details of child care facilities available to Members and staff of the House were given on 23 October 1995, Official Report, columns 458–59. There has not been any significant change since then.

Copyright

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what steps are being taken to protect the copyright of parliamentary papers in the creation of an agency to run HMSO. [677]

Mr. Beith: By virtue of sections 165 to 167 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, the copyright in any work made by, or under the direction or control of, the House of Commons is owned by the House. The functions of the House as owner of copyright are exercised by the Speaker on the House's behalf. I can assure my hon. Friend that the Commission is well aware of the importance of protecting the House's control of that copyright and will do so vigorously. The statutory provisions I have cited are not affected by the Government's proposals to privatise HMSO.

Radio 5 Live

Miss Hoey: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee whether he will arrange for Radio 5 Live to be made available on the Parliamentary Data and Video Network in place of London Radio; and if he will make a statement. [2562]

Mr. Waller: Following a notice in the all-party Whip seeking Members' views on the proposal, the Information Committee has endorsed the substitution of Radio 5 Live for London Radio, which will be effected as soon as the necessary technical arrangements can be made. It should be noted that Radio 5 Live broadcasts on AM and thus the sound quality may not be as good as the FM transmissions. In the longer-term, the Committee proposes that the requirement for more television programmes will make it necessary to phase out radio on the Parliamentary Data and Video Network.

Parliamentary Data and Video Network

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what assessment he has made of the reliability of the Parliamentary Data and Video Network. [679]

Mr. Waller: The Parliamentary Data and Video Network provides a data network which is operational 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. It has been running continuously since November 1993, although it has grown considerably during that time. For the two years from November 1993 to October 1995 inclusive, downtime for the network has been calculated as follows:

	Hours	Percentage
PDVN unscheduled downtime	101.65	0.58
PDVN scheduled downtime	316.25	1.80
Downtime attributable to PWD/works	1,056.00	6.03
Total	1,473.90	8.41

PDVN scheduled downtime and PWD works downtime have almost all occurred over weekends or on other non-sitting days.

On the afternoon of 16 November, a serious fault occurred on the network which resulted in intermittent problems for all users of the PDVN. The cause of the fault has now been located and the E-mail address corruption which occurred as a result of the fault is being remedied. A full investigation is under way into the cause in order to prevent a similar occurrence.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many times in the last year he has used (a) London Buses and (b) London Underground while on official business. [413]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: For short journeys in London, I usually walk—a practice I recommend to the hon. Member. For journeys outside London, I usually take the train.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1396]

Mr. Boswell: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister. In the past five years only one such certificate has been issued—in 1993. Its purpose was to make a claim for public interest immunity for certain categories of confidential documents held by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the case of Littlewood v. Department of Health and MAFF, so as to enable the High Court to decide whether the interests of justice required them to be disclosed in the case.

Arable Area Payments Scheme

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each county in England the largest single amount to an individual under the set-aside compensatory payment scheme. [2395]

Mr. Baldry: For reasons of confidentiality, it is not possible to identify separately any payments made under the arable area payments scheme.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each county in England the number of people claiming set-aside compensatory payments in respect of land previously used to grow crops; and if he will give a total amount by county. [2394]

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) on 22 November 1995, Official Report, columns 199-200.

Dry Stone Walls

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what (a) grants and (b) other support will be available from his Department for the conservation and protection of dry stone walls from April 1996; [2325]

(2) what plans he has to introduce a nationwide grant scheme for the conservation and protection of dry stone walls. [2326]

Mr. Boswell: The Department's responsibilities in this area extend only to England. Payments for the restoration of dry stone walls are available under the environmentally sensitive areas scheme. We shall shortly issue a consultation paper giving detailed proposals for the future of the countryside stewardship scheme, which provides payments for environmental purposes in the wider countryside outside ESAs.

Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fishing vessel decommissions his Department funded during the year 1994–95; what was the average funding per vessel; what is the average cost of decommissioning a vessel; and how many vessel owners applied to his Department for funding to decommission their vessels during the year 1994–95. [2653]

Mr. Baldry: Under the Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning) Scheme 1994, 471 applications were received, and 162 vessels were successfully decommissioned at a total cost of £8.8 million. The average cost per vessel was some £54,160. Owners submit bids taking account of the cost of the applicant of scrapping. Information on this cost is not available centrally.

Departmental Targets

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the published recommended response time within which his Department is expected to reply to letters from the public. [3000]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This Department has a recommended response time of 28 days from the date of receipt to reply to letters from members of the public.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Civil Service (Casual Staff)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will specify the equivalent qualifications to O-Levels for employment as a civil service casual administrative assistant; and what assessment he has made as to whether those qualifications are such as not to constitute a prima facie case of discrimination against women who have brought up children. [1411]

Sir John Wheeler: The following qualifications are accepted as equivalent to the normal eligibility requirement of at least two grade C passes in GCSE-GCE O-Level including English language for the purposes of employment as a casual administrative assistance in the Northern Ireland civil service:

BEC Higher National Diploma
BEC Higher National Certificate
BEC National Diploma
BEC National Certificate
BEC General Diploma
BEC General Certificate
BEC Certificate in Office Studies
TEC Higher Diploma

TEC Higher Certificate
Btec Higher National Diploma
Btec Higher National Certificate
Btec National Diploma
Btec National Certificate
Btec General Diploma
Btec General Certificate
Btec 1st Awards
RSA Certificate/Diploma in Office Procedures
RSA Certificate Office Practice Level II
RSA Certificate Office Studies
RSA Business Administration
NCVQ Level I and II Business Administration
SNVQ Level I and II Business Administration
City and Guilds Technician Certificate.

Other formal qualifications equivalent to a grade C pass in individual subject areas are also acceptable. Formal qualifications not on the above list are considered on a case-by-case basis. It is not evident how the use of such an extensive range of qualifications would constitute a prima facie case of discrimination against women who have brought up children.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will arrange for satisfactory previous employment as a casual administrative assistant in the civil service to be added to the list of qualifications equivalent to O-levels for future such employment as a casual. [1412]

Sir John Wheeler: No. This concession would only benefit persons erroneously admitted to the civil service without valid educational qualifications in the past and would be unfair to others correctly refused entry by reason of lack of such qualifications.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are employed as casuals within the Northern Ireland civil service; what is the number of such casuals who are currently in receipt of a civil service pension; and what is the average annual present amount of such pensions and the various grounds on which these individuals with such pensions retired. [1410]

Sir John Wheeler: The total number of casual staff employed in the Northern Ireland Office and the six Northern Ireland Departments is 1,420

Information on the number of casuals in the Department of Health and Social Services who are in receipt of a civil service pension could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In the Northern Ireland Office and the remaining five Northern Ireland Departments there are two casuals in receipt of a civil service pension; the average amount is £5,311. Both officers retired on age grounds.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those projects which have now been identified as being suitable for the private finance initiative; and if he will make a statement on the private finance initiative. [1159]

Sir John Wheeler: A range of projects across all Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office are under consideration, including schemes covering sewage treatment plants in the Water Executive, IT in the Land Registry and hospital equipment leases. The Department of Finance and Personnel is undertaking a scoping study to identify the application of PFI to all areas within Northern Ireland Departments and the NIO.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he proposes to commence the private finance initiative in Northern Ireland, if it will be operational in all the Departments of government and if he will make a statement about progress towards the practical implementation of the private finance initiative. [1158]

Sir John Wheeler: All Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Office and their non-departmental public bodies are fully committed to the private finance initiative and a number of projects are already under consideration in Northern Ireland. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made it clear that capital projects will not be approved unless private finance options have been explored.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1437]

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Countryside, Planning and Energy Efficiency to the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) on 17 May, Official Report, columns 260-62.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public interest immunity certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1419]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: As regards the period to March 1994, I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 18 February 1994, Official Report, column 1034, and 3 March 1994, Official Report, column 914.

In October 1994 I signed two certificates. In each case, in connection with civil proceedings I made a claim for certain members of prison immediate reaction forces to be screened from the public and for the protection from disclosure of certain information relating to control and restraint techniques used in prisons.

In January 1995 I signed a certificate in relation to an inquest to protect police intelligence gathering operations and the lives and safety of people involved.

In May and June 1995 I signed two certificates in relation to civil proceedings to protect information relating to three shooting incidents in 1982 and their subsequent investigations.

In June 1995 the Minister of State signed a certificate in relation to civil proceedings, making a claim for certain members of prison immediate reaction forces to be screened from the public.

In October 1995 I signed a certificate in relation to civil proceedings, making a claim to protect certain police documents.

A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is normally made by the appropriate Minister.

Temazepam

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what amount of Temazepam per capita is distributed annually in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [1509]

Mr. Moss: In 1994, 64g of Temazepam were dispensed on prescription per 1,000 population in Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaths in each of the past five years are attributable to the abuse of Temazepam (a) in Northern Ireland and (b) in each health district. [1510]

Sir John Wheeler: There have been no deaths recorded in Northern Ireland in each of the past five years attributable to Temazepam abuse.

Stormont Buildings

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if the cost of the refurbishment of the Stormont buildings will be met by an increased allocation of funds; [1602]

(2) what is the estimated cost of the refurbishment of Stormont buildings following the fire; [1601]

(3) what proportion of the money for the refurbishment of Stormont buildings will be taken from existing departmental budgets. [1603]

Mr. Moss: The estimated cost of refurbishing Parliament Buildings is £20 million. This figure provides for the comprehensive refurbishment of the entire building and includes provision of approximately £1.5 million–£2 million for the restoration of the fire damaged Commons Chamber.

The total cost of the project is being met from existing departmental budgets; no additional allocation of funds has been made.

Trade Union Commissioner

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has received in respect of the objectivity of the commissioner for the rights of trade union members. [1409]

Mr. Ancram: None.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the annual cost of operating a separate Northern Ireland commissioner for the rights of trade union members over each of the last two years and the equivalent costs of its Great Britain counterpart; and, for both bodies, what were the numbers of inquiries resulting in an application for assistance in those two years. [1408]

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	Annual operating costs £		Inquiries resulting in application for assistance
	1993–94	1994–95	1993–94	1994–95
Northern Ireland Commissioner for the rights of Trade Union Members	31,741	33,643	7	15
(Great Britain) Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members	274,941	293,716	47	57

Higher Education

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for how many student places would provision in Northern Ireland need to be increased to match the proportionate provision for Scottish students in Scotland. [1770]

Mr. Ancram: For every Scottish domiciled full-time undergraduate student in the United Kingdom there are 1.274 full-time undergraduate places in Scotland—1993–94 figures. For a similar ratio to hold in Northern Ireland, the number of full-time undergraduate places in the Province would need to increase by 15,500.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what research has been done by his Department to look at the adequacy of the provision of places in higher education for Northern Ireland students within Northern Ireland. [1771]

Mr. Ancram: The Northern Ireland Higher Education Council, which advises the Government on the planning and funding of higher education in Northern Ireland, presented a report to me earlier this year on access, participation and student migration. This report will inform Government's consideration of the adequacy of the provisions of places in higher education for Northern Ireland students within Northern Ireland.

In addition, consultants have been commissioned to undertake an economic appraisal of the university of Ulster's proposal for a new campus in north and west Belfast. One of the aims of this study is to appraise the options for accommodating growth in higher education provision in Northern Ireland. The consultant's final report should be completed shortly.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Northern Ireland students have higher education places elsewhere in Great Britain; and how many higher education students from Great Britain study in Northern Ireland. [1772]

Mr. Ancram: In 1993–94, 12,300 Northern Ireland domiciled students had higher education places in Great Britain, and 900 students domiciled in Great Britain had higher education places in Northern Ireland.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1952]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Springvale Campus Project

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to publish the Planning, Industrial and Economic Development Advisers' evaluation of the Springvale campus project. [1777]

Mr. Ancram: It is not the normal policy of the Government to publish economic appraisals. None the less, given the importance of this case, the Secretary of State and I are considering options as to what information to make available publicly. The economic appraisal is still not complete, and we will wish to see the completed report before deciding on the most appropriate way of informing the public of its findings.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list all occasions since 31 August 1994 when the RUC has used plastic bullets, giving in each case the number used, the details of the injuries and the circumstances in which such shootings took place. [1961]

Sir John Wheeler: The occasions since 31 August 1994 when the RUC fired plastic baton rounds, the number fired, the number of people allegedly injured and the circumstances in which the plastic baton rounds were fired are listed:

Plastic baton rounds fired by the RUC
1 September 1994–21 November 1995

Date	Location	Number fired	Number of alleged injuries	Circumstances
13 September 1994	Belfast	1	—	Hijacking/rioting/petrol bombs thrown

TRANSPORT

A5

13. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of recent improvements to the A5 from the M69 junction to the Longshoot junction; if he will list the works; and what further improvements are planned. [655]

Mr. Watts: The recently completed scheme cost £610.000.

The works include:

Widening the A5 and installation of new traffic lights;

A turning lane for premises on the north side of the A5;

An extension to Wapping Barn bridge; and creation of a cycleway on the north side of the A5.

Further works in hand and planned are:

Developer funded scheme currently under way;

Extension to A5 cycleway facilities;

Provision of ghost island at Nutts lane.

Rail Services, North-West England

18. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what interest has been expressed in running rail services in the north-west of England following privatisation. [661]

Mr. Watts: The franchising director has not yet sought indications of interest in the rail franchises in the north-west of England. Good progress is being made with the franchising programme and the franchising director continues to prepare services for offering to the private sector in accordance with his objective from the Government to franchise passenger rail services as rapidly as is reasonably practicable.

Heathrow

19. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take to reduce aircraft flights from Heathrow during 1997. [662]

Mr. Norris: I do not propose to take action during 1997 to reduce aircraft flights from Heathrow.

Road Building Programme

20. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the planned expenditure in the road building programme for 1995–96. [664]

Mr. Watts: The Government plan to spend £1,775 million on trunk roads in England in 1995–96. Roads in Wales are, of course, the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

London Transport (Investment)

22. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about investment in London Transport. [666]

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations from a variety of organisations and individual members of the public about investment in London Transport.

Fenchurch Street Line

23. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on the privatisation of the Fenchurch Street line. [667]

Mr. Watts: Very good progress has been made, and the franchising director expects to award the LTS Rail franchise in December.

Rail Services (Monitoring)

25. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to monitor the performance of providers of rail services. [669]

Mr. Watts: The performance of train operating companies is currently monitored by the British Railways Board and the rail users' consultative committees. Franchises will be required to provide the franchising director with information to enable him to monitor operational performance and customer satisfaction levels.

Fatal Accidents

26. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what new proposals he has to reduce the total of fatal accidents. [670]

Mr. Norris: Fatalities from road accidents are at their lowest level since records began and have fallen for five successive years. The measures that we are taking to reduce road casualties in general should help reduce fatal road accidents still further. These include the introduction of a theory test as part of the driving test in July 1996 and the "Safe Town" initiative announced in July this year.

Buses (Disabled Access)

27. Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he will take to ensure reasonable access for the disabled to public bus services. [671]

Mr. Norris: We have taken powers in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 to enable us to make regulations to require new buses and coaches to be accessible to disabled people, including those who use wheelchairs. Similar provisions have also been included for taxis and rail vehicles.

Discussions are already under way with the bus and coach industry—manufacturers and operators—on the shape of the regulations which will be introduced as soon as we have determined appropriate technical solutions which are effective and sustainable.

London-Tilbury-Southend Line

28. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress in introducing private competition in the London–Tilbury–Southend Line. [672]

Mr. Watts: Very good progress has been made, and the franchising director expects to award the LTS Rail franchise in December.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made against the Government's timetable for rail privatisation; and if he will make a statement. [647]

Sir George Young: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) earlier today.

East London Line

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the full restoration of London Underground services on the east London line to occur. [660]

Mr. Norris: London Underground has re-applied to the London Docklands development corporation for listed building consent to strengthen and waterproof the tunnel carrying the east London line under the Thames. The timing of the re-opening of the line depends on the progress of its application.

M62 Relief Road

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make a decision in relation to the future of the proposals of his Department for a M62 relief road. [665]

Mr. Watts: I have received a large number of representations about the scheme from my hon. Friend and others. From these, it is clear that the majority of people consulted about the relief road do not want it. In the light of consultation I have decided to withdraw plans to build the relief road.

Rail Passengers

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people travel by train in the course of one year. [668]

Mr. Watts: Some 25 million people made at least one train journey in 1991, the latest year for which figures are available.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for his Department in 1993–94. [1917]

Mr. Norris: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. Departments' policy responsibilities are subject to change and can vary from year to year. My Department currently has responsibility for 1.77 per cent. of the Community's research and development budget.

Locomotives

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his estimate for the cost of obtaining information about how many British Rail locomotives since 1992 (a) have been scrapped, (b) offered for sale and (c) are currently in storage as surplus to requirements; [2322]

(2) what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Railways Board about the refusal of British Rail to put up for sale locomotives which are surplus to its requirements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Watts: The policy agreed between the Government and the British Railways Board is that where freight equipment is identified as surplus to operational requirements, it will be offered for sale by BR on a competitive basis. Operational requirements includes the retention of old rolling stock for spare parts, and holding a strategic reserve for potential future traffic. Detailed questions about the location, value and ultimate fate of old locomotives—and the cost of undertaking surveys—are for BR and its subsidiary companies.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what estimate he has made of the cost of obtaining information regarding the number of British Rail locomotives, currently being stored out of use, which have been offered for sale to operators or potential operators of train services; [3074]

(2) if he will estimate the value of the British Rail locomotives currently stored out of use and surplus to requirements which (a) are being offered for sale and (b) are not being offered for sale. [3073]

Mr. Watts: I refer the hon. Member to my replies given today.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from potential operators of train services complaining about the refusal by British Rail to sell surplus locomotives. [658]

Mr. Watts: The Department of Transport has received representations from one potential operator of train services regarding this matter.

Rail Freight

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's policy with regard to the promotion of cross-channel freight traffic by rail. [2685]

Mr. Watts: The Government have supported BR's investment of over £400 million in channel tunnel freight services. This demonstrates our commitment to the development of international rail freight services.

Taxis (Disabled Access)

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce regulations requiring taxis to be accessible for wheelchairs. [2104]

Mr. Norris: The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 gives the Secretary of State power to make regulations for that purpose. My right hon. Friend will be preparing regulations and will consult interested parties before laying regulations before the House. One subject of the consultation will be when the regulations should come into effect.

In London, all taxis will have to be wheelchair accessible by 1 January 2000 following a decision announced in December 1988. Outside London some local authorities have already set their own dates for wheelchair accessibility.

Skid Resistance

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the method of skid resistance measurement to take account of critical road conditions. [2222]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Ms Joan Walley, dated 27 November 1995:

The Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to write to you in reply to your Parliamentary Question concerning measurement of skid resistance.

We are continually reviewing the method of skid resistance measurement. The United Kingdom os one of the few countries in Europe to have a policy in which road surfaces are designed to provide adequate skid resistance at both low and high speed, and reflecting the different site conditions that occur. This is achieved through specification of polish resistant stone together with a minimum level of surface roughness, supported by regular monitoring of skid resistance during the life of a road.

The Highways Agency also have an active programme of research and international cooperation in skid resistance measurement aimed at improving the accuracy of measurement techniques to reflect all road conditions.

Penzance-Bristol Line

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if it is the Government's policy to promote the designation of the Penzance-Bristol railway line as part of the trans-European rail network. [2356]

Mr. Watts: The inclusion of the Penzance-Bristol line in the draft trans-European rail network map was supported by the United Kingdom Government. The Council of Ministers reached a common position on the trans-European transport network at the June Council. The rail network map, as agreed by the Council, includes the Penzance-Bristol railway line.

Road Accidents

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) deaths and (b) injuries resulting from road accidents have been recorded in each year for the last 15 years; and how many of those affected were under the age of 15 years. [1804]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is shown in the table.

Road accident casualties in Great Britain: 1979–1994

	All ages	of which under 15
	Killed	Injured	Killed	Injured
1979	6,352	328,161	591	46,832

1. Casualties reported to the Department of Transport by the Police.

Road Building Programme

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the road building programme. [306]

Mr. Watts: No.

Automatic Ticket Machines

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at how many underground stations automatic ticket machines have been installed; at what cost; how many stations remain without such machines; and if he will make a statement. [1492]

Mr. Norris: These are operational matters for London Underground Ltd.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place all documents currently held by his Department relating to the destruction of Pan Am 103 over Lockerbie in the Library. [1635]

Mr. Norris: No.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1957]

Mr. Norris: Information is not available in the form requested.

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2030]

Mr. Norris: The legislation for which my Department had responsibility contains provisions for the repeal or amendment of other enactments in the usual way. The following Acts provide power, exercisable by statutory instrument, to modify or exclude the application of enactments contained in primary legislation:

The Road Traffic (Temporary Restrictions) Act 1991 (section 2)

The Road Traffic Act 1991 (sections 23, 27, 76, 77 and Schedule 3)

The New Roads and Street Works Act 1991 (section 102)

The Transport and Works Act 1992 (section 5)

The Finance Act 1993 (section 21)

The Railways Act 1993 (section 153)

The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (section 33).

International Maritime Organisation

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what new proposals he has concerning the United Kingdom's relations with the International Maritime Organisation. [2152]

Mr. Norris: None.

Bull Bars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will commission research as to whether bull bars (a) inhibit the operation of airbags, (b) lead to higher risk of chassis distortion in accidents and (c) increase the danger to drivers and passengers in cars fitted with bull bars. [2262]

Mr. Norris: The Transport Research Laboratory is investigating all reported injury accidents involving vehicles fitted with bull bars. Its work covers all aspects of these accidents and an interim report is due at the end of the year.

Trans-Europeans Networks

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what capital projects are to be funded, partially or fully, by the EU TEN programme. [2160]

Mr. Watts: The European Community's financing regulation for TENs provides for the funding of transport and other capital projects in the period 1995–1999. Funding decisions will be taken on an annual basis and so far only the funds for 1995 have been allocated.

In line with the conclusions of the Cannes European Council, just over 75 per cent. of the 1995 funds have been allocated to the 14 priority projects identified by the Essen Council, which are:

High speed rail/combined transport link, Berlin-Verona

High speed rail link, Paris-Brussels-Cologne-Amsterdam-London (includes CTRL)

High speed rail, Madrid-Montpelier

Betuwe line (rail/combined transport), Netherlands-Germany

High speed rail/combined transport, Lyon-Turin-Trieste

High speed rail, France-Germany

Greek motorway schemes

Motorway, Lisbon-Valladolid

Railway/combined transport, Cork-Dublin-Larne

Malpensa Airport (Milan)

Oresund fixed link, Denmark-Sweden

The Nordic triangle (road and rail)

High speed rail, West Coast Main Line

Ireland-UK-Benelux Road Link

The remaining 25 per cent. has been allocated to over 50 other priority projects, mostly involving traffic management studies.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport announced the 1995 allocation of TENs funding to the UK in his reply to the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) on 26 October, Official Report column 732.

TENs funding for 1996 and beyond cannot be decided until the transport guidelines have been adopted by the European Council and European Parliament. We will, however, shortly be consulting with interested parties as to what schemes might be included in the UK's 1996 bid.

Channel Tunnel Services

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the first sleeper trains through the channel tunnel are expected to come into service. [2159]

Mr. Watts: European Night Services Ltd., which will operate the sleeper services through the channel tunnel, expects to phase them in starting in the second half of 1996.

A650

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what expenditure has been incurred to date on preparatory works for the A650 Bingley bypass; [2817]

(2) what is the number of (a) fatal, (b) serious and (c) minor accident casualties which have occurred during the most recent five years for which statistics are available on the section of the A650 trunk road due to be relieved by the proposed A650 Bingley bypass; [2818]

(3) what is the estimated annual cost to business and industry of traffic delays on the section of the A650 trunk road due to be relieved by the proposed Bingley bypass. [2816]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Gary Waller, dated 27 November 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions asking about the estimated annual cost to business and industry of traffic delays on the section of A650 trunk road due to be relieved by the proposed Bingley Bypass, the number of accidents in the most recent years on the same stretch of road and the costs incurred to date on preparatory works for the bypass.

The estimated annual cost of delays on this length of the A650 is £1.75m.

Between January 1990 and October 1995, there were 2 fatal, 34 serious and 186 slight accidents resulting in 281 casualties.

The total cost of preparatory works, including design fees, is £18.9m.

Manchester Metro

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on (a) the funding of the Manchester Metrolink light rail and (b) the environmental benefits achieved by Metrolink. [2829]

Mr. Norris: Bids for light rail schemes are submitted to my Department during the annual transport policies and programmes—TPP—round, and are funded through the package approach. I am prepared to consider supporting light rail schemes, including extensions to the Metrolink, provided they can be demonstrated to be the right and most cost-effective solution to a particular urban transport problem, where they are planned within the context of a strategy or transport package to achieve mode shift away from the private car and where they will attract significant private sector and local investment. It should be remembered, however, that light rail is not the only solution to urban transport problems, and the difficulties and costs associated with developing schemes should not be underestimated.

Manchester Metrolink is currently carrying about 13 million passengers a year, and is estimated to have removed about 1.3 million car journeys a year from the corridor it serves.

QEII

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the report made by the Marine Safety Agency on the QEII before it sailed from Southampton in December 1994. [3116]

Mr. Norris: We intend to publish the report shortly.

Cycle Tracks

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what system the use of cycle tracks is monitored; and if he will make a statement. [2873]

Mr. Norris: It is for each highway authority to judge whether and to what extent it should monitor the use made of its cycle tracks.

Charter Trains

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Government are taking to expand the charter train market in the new railways regime. [663]

Mr. Watts: The expansion of the charter train market is a commercial matter for charter train operators and the rail industry. Railtrack welcomes applications from operators seeking to run charter trains on its network.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average monetary value of maintenance assessments undertaken by the Child Support Agency to date, excluding those produced by the implementation of interim maintenance assessments. [1574]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mr. William Cash, dated 24 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency assessments.

In cases where the absent parent has earned income the average full maintenance assessment, as at May 1995, was £39.69. When absent parents on benefit are included the average figure was £23.53.

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of child support maintenance applications which the Child Support Agency has dealt with to date (a) where full maintenance assessments have resulted in monetary values less than or equal to the prescribed minimum under the Act, currently £2.35, (b) where full maintenance assessments have resulted in monetary values greater than the prescribed minimum under the Act, currently £2.35, (c) where interim assessments are currently in force, (d) which are currently classed as deferred under the measures announced in December 1994 and (e) which are still pending but which are within the CSA's current work load. [1573]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mr. William Cash, dated 24 November 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency assessments.

The information requested is shown in the table below:

Number of Full Maintenance Assessments with a value between zero and £2.35	Number of Full Maintenance Assessments with a value greater than £2.35	Number of Interim Maintenance Assessments in force
144,510	166,945	92,998

Data supplied as at 15 September 1995. In addition, you requested information on the number of cases currently classed as deferred under the measures announced in December 1994. The number of cases deferred was in the region of 350,000. The actual number of these still pending is less because some clients have asked the Agency to take on their case, and others are no longer receiving benefit. On this basis we estimate that there are around 300,000 cases remaining to be taken on.

At the end of September 1995, the Child Support Agency had 384,500 applications for child maintenance on hand, pending action.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what date he became aware of the disputes between (a) EDS and Computer Associates and (b) other parties; and if the supply of the Child Support Agency's computer system was affected by these legal disputes. [2016]

Mr. Mitchell: At the time the contract for the Child Support Agency system was awarded to EDS, there was no knowledge of any dispute between EDS and any other party.

During subsequent development of the system by EDS it became known that it was in dispute with Computer Associates but this had no effect on supply of the system.

The only other dispute known is the dispute between EDS and the state of Florida. Information on this was obtained from the computer press some time after the supply of the system.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in how many cases where an absent parent has been approached by the child support agency he has become aware that the absent parent has become unemployed. [2013]

Mr. Mitchell: The information requested is not available. Practical experience has shown that very few absent parents deliberately leave their jobs to avoid paying maintenance for their children. This is because the maintenance assessment formula ensures that all absent parents, and their second families, are at least £30 a week better off after payment of maintenance than they would be if unemployed and receiving income support. No one can now be assessed to pay more than 30 per cent. of their net income in current maintenance. In addition, someone who has left work voluntarily is not entitled to unemployment benefit, and income support is payable at a reduced rate.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made towards cutting energy consumption in Government buildings for which he has responsibility in each year since 1990. [1439]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend, the Minister for Construction and Planning to the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) on 17 May, Official Report, columns 260-62, for details of this Department's energy performance from 1990–91 to 1993–94. My hon. Friend will be publishing details of Departments' performances in 1994–95 shortly and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of those claiming housing benefit are in (a) part-time or (b) temporary employment. [1461]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available in the format requested as it is not possible to identify separately the number of housing benefit recipients who are in temporary employment. The available information is set out in the table.

Housing benefit recipients with earnings: Great Britain, May 1994

	Also in receipt of income support	Not in receipt of income support	Total
Number of housing benefit recipients with earnings	96,000	320,000	416,000

Source

Housing Benefit Management Information System annual 1 per cent. sample, May 1994.

Notes

a) Figures refer to benefit units which may be a single person or a couple.

b) The figure for housing benefit recipients who are also in receipt of income support represents part-time earners only. The figure for housing benefit recipients not in receipt of income support represents full-time and part-time earners.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list all those in his Department who have authority to issue public immunity interest certificates; how many such certificates have been issued in each of the last five years; and what were the main reasons for them. [1392]

Mr. Burt: Public interest immunity certificates relating to departmental documents or information are normally authorised by the appropriate Minister. No such certificates have been issued in respect of the Department of Social Security in the past five years.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for his Department in 1993–94. [1916]

Mr. Burt: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. Departments' policy responsibilities are subject to change and can vary from year to year. This Department currently has responsibility for 0.12 per cent. of the Community's R and D budget.

Benefit Savings

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of the benefit savings cited in his answer of 19 April, Official Report, column 181, were due to (a) maintenance paid and (b) benefit not paid. [2071]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: All benefit savings are due to benefit not paid.

Legislative Repeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2035]

Mr. Heald: The legislation passed within this Department in the last five years which contains provisions for statutory repeal or review is as follows:

Disability Discrimination Act 1995 section 7(5)

Pensions Schemes Act 1993 section 41 (1)—(2)

Pensions Act 1995 sections 137(5) and 138(5)

The Pensions (Polish Forces) Scheme (Extension) Order 1992.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of Social Security what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1955]

Mr. Burt: We do not collect information on the size of companies who supply the DSS with goods and services.

However, we are pursuing a number of procurement initiatives which should help small businesses. These include ensuring that we minimise the paperwork burden for prospective suppliers, and involvement in the HM Treasury's central unit on procurement working group on SME's—small and medium enterprises.

Part-time Work

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the benefits system to encourage (a) part-time work and (b) job sharing. [2155]

Mr. Roger Evans: Family credit already helps 215,000 people working between 16 and 24 hours a week. In 1994 we introduced a child care disregard to remove a stumbling block preventing some parents from taking up work. Disability working allowance also tops up the earnings of some disabled people who work for 16 hours or more a week. From October 1996 we are piloting in eight areas earnings top-up, a new in-work benefit for people without dependant children. This will also help people working 16 hours a week or more to be better off in work.

In October 1996 we are introducing a back-to-work bonus whereby those on income support or jobseeker's allowance who undertake small amounts of work of less than 16 hours a week can accumulate a lump sum of up to £1,000 based on their part-time earnings. This will be paid when either the claimant or partner moves into work which takes them off benefit.

From October 1996 the partner of a claimant receiving jobseeker's allowance or income support will be able to take work of up to 24 hours a week without removing entitlement to benefit. There will also be a £10 disregard in respect of both of these benefits.

Job sharing is a matter which is best left to employers and employees to arrange, but the measures already taken should facilitate it.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the benefits which were subsequently claimed by the 18,895 people who were found capable of work following the all work test referred to in his answer of 23 October 1995, Official Report, column 485. [1840]

Mr. Burt [holding answer 24 November 1995]: Of incapacity benefit claimants found capable of work following the application of the all work test between April and September, 8,974 have claimed unemployment benefit. Information for other benefits claimed is not available.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people who have been found capable of work between April and October 1995 were undertaking exempt work under regulation 17(a) of the Incapacity for Work (General Regulations); [1752]

(2) how many people in receipt of (a) severe disablement allowance, and (b) incapacity benefit, undertaking exempt work under regulation 17(a) of the Incapacity for Work (General) Regulations, have subsequently lost benefit because they have earned above the earnings limit; [1830]

(3) how many people in receipt of (a) severe disablement allowance and (b) incapacity benefit, are also undertaking work which is exempt under regulation 17(a)(i), (ii) and (iii) of the Incapacity for Work (General) Regulations; and what is the average amount of their earnings. [1831]

Mr. Burt [holding answer 24 November 1995]: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of incapacity benefit are currently exempt from the all-work test by virtue of (a) receipt of the highest rate of the disability living allowance care component, (b) in receipt of invalidity benefit and aged over 58 years on 13 April, (c) with a serious medical condition and (d) a serious mental illness. [1832]

Mr. Burt [holding answer 24 November 1995]: Such information as is available is in the table.

Reason for exemption from all work test	Number exempt
Receipt of the Disability Living Allowance highest rate care component	20,976
Receipt of Invalidity Benefit between 1 December 1993 and 12 April 1995 and aged 58 or over on 13 April 1995	480,000
Severe medical condition, including severe mental illness	138,828

1. Figures for severe mental illness are not separately available.

2. Figures for exempt incapacity benefit claimants who are also in receipt of Widow's Benefit are not held on the computer system and are not included above.

3. Information available to end of October 1995.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of incapacity benefit between April and October 1995 have had their benefit suspended for undertaking work which is not exempt. [1833]

Mr. Burt [holding answer 24 November 1995]: Claimants are treated as capable of work for any week in which they do work which is not in one of the permitted categories.

Information is not available on the number of people who leave incapacity benefit for work, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of invalidity benefit failed to attend a medical examination to assess their incapacity for work in each of the quarters ending December 1994 and March 1995. [1747]

Mr. Burt: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Keith Bradley dated 24 November 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about how many claimants of Invalidity Benefit failed to attend a medical examination to assess their incapacity for work in each of the quarters ending December 1994 and March 1995.

Information is not available in the format requested. This is because separate statistics for each benefit were not kept on the numbers failing to attend a medical examination.

The total number of customers who failed to attend a medical examination, in respect of Invalidity Benefit and Sickness Benefit, to assess their incapacity for work in the quarter ending December 1994 was 17,750 and for the quarter ending March 1995, the figure was 20,066.

I hope you find this reply helpful.-

Income Support

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the cost of raising the £15 earnings disregard to £44 per week for people entitled to the disability premium in each of the benefits (a) income support, (b) housing benefit and (c) council tax benefit. [1754]

Mr. Roger Evans [holding answer 24 November 1995]: The information is set out in the table.

Benefit	Cost £ million
Income support	10
Council tax benefit	10
Housing benefit	20
Total	35

1. Based on data taken from the 1994 Annual Statistical Enquiry and from the 1991–92–93 Family Expenditure Surveys uprated to 1995–96 prices, benefits and earnings levels.

2. For HB/CTB cases the estimate of the proportion of disability premium cases with earnings is based on data taken from the 1994 HBMIS data.

3. As it is not possible to model changes in hours worked due to the suggested increase in the earnings disregard, any costs/savings arising from changes in hours worked have not been included.

4. Lone parents in receipt of the disability premium are assumed to benefit from the change. Disabled pensioners have not been included as they are in receipt of a Pensioner rather a disability premium.

5. Figures have been rounded to the nearest £5 million.

HEALTH

Nurse Resignations

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses have resigned from their positions within the national health service in the last 12 months. [179]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available in the form requested.

Nurses who resign from their posts, for whatever reason, are not necessarily lost from the national health service as many are likely to resume an NHS post after a career break. As nursing is a predominantly female profession this is to be expected. People take career breaks for a wide variety of reasons ranging from having a family to extending their skills and experience by exploring other fields of employment. Naturally the Government are keen to harness this invaluable body of training, skills and experience and bring them back into the NHS.

Ministerial Transport, London

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many times in the last year he used (a) London Buses and (b) the London Underground while on official business. [416]

Mr. Dorrell: I have not travelled on London Buses or the London Underground in an official capacity in the last year.

Mental Hospitals

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to commission another survey of English mental hospitals to monitor their closure, comparable to those commissioned by the mental health task force in 1993 and 1994. [1920]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Residential Places and Hospital Beds

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) local authority residential places, (b) independent sector residential places, (c) national health service long-stay geriatric and psycho-geriatric beds and (d) independent sector nursing home places there were in (i) 1970 and (ii) 1990. [1127]

Mr. Bowis: The information available centrally is shown in the table. The figures for 1970 are not strictly comparable with those for 1990 due to a variety of changes in recording practices.

Residential places and hospital beds

	1970[1]	1990[1]
Local authority residential places[2]	n/a[3]	105,400
Independent sector residential places[2]	54,900	180,500
NHS geriatric hospital beds (annual average available)[4,5]	39,591[6]	48,734
NHS psycho-geriatric long-stay hospitals beds (annual average available)[5]	n/a[7]	18,879
Independent sector nursing home places[8]	n/a[9]	94,313

[1] Figures for 1970 relate to 31 December; those for 1990 relate to 31 March.
[2] Places in homes for elderly people and people with physical and/or sensory disabilities.
[3] Information on places was not collected in 1970; there were 99,700 elderly residents in local authority residential homes at 31 December 1970.
[4] Figures are for long and short stay beds.

Wheelchairs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that NHS community trusts do not require insurance cover for wheelchairs loaned to patients. [1786]

Mr. Bowis: Patients are not required to insure their wheelchairs. Patients issued with a powered indoor-outdoor wheelchair may be advised to take out third party insurance so that they are covered against personal liability in the event of an accident.

Network of Access and Child Contact Centres

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to fund the work of the Network of Access and Child Contact Centres. [1903]

Mr. Bowis: The Network of Access and Child Contact Centres may apply for section 64 funding from the Department of Health in the same way as any other voluntary organisation, but it has not done so in the current round.

Consultants

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the results of the national survey of the work load of 274 NHS consultants. [540]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the Medical Workforce Standing Advisory Committee's second report, which refers to a survey conducted by the Hospital Consultants and Specialists Association in 1992–93 on the amount of time spent by its members on purely management activities. The committee's report is available in the Library.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will institute an inquiry into the arrangements for and costs of (a) each retirement of consultants and (b) their subsequent re-employment on a part-time basis. [1800]

Mr. Malone: Most pension arrangements cover all staff groups, including consultants. Data on the cost of consultant retirements, and their subsequent re-employment on a part-time basis, are not available centrally. I have no plans to institute an inquiry on costs for consultants as a separate group.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the average percentage of local authority personal social services budgets currently spent on mental health services; [1922]

(2) how many local authorities' expenditure falls below the average currently spent on mental health services; and if he will list those authorities, giving the percentage of their budgets devoted to such services, in descending order. [1923]

Mr. Bowis: Local authorities' budget returns for 1995–96 show that, overall, planned expenditure on mental health services in England represents 5.6 per cent. of the total of personal social services budgets.

The 57 authorities who have budgeted to spend below that percentage on mental health services are shown in the table.

Personal social services: percentage of total budgeted expenditure on mental health services 1995–96

	Percentage
Hereford and Worcester	5.5
Avon	5.3
Cheshire	5.3
Bromley	5.1

Percentages based on figures from local authorities' budget returns on form RA96.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for health if it is his policy that places for mentally ill people in residential homes are interchangeable with psychiatric hospital beds. [1921]

Mr. Bowis: Our policy is that mentally ill people should be placed in the accommodation best suited to their assessed needs.

Bed Availability

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis of usage, survey or projection he has instructed or advised district health authorities of the number of beds per unit or population; and what adjustments in those levels are made for observed and recorded variations in needs for acute health care. [1796]

Mr. Sackville: We have not issued any central guidance. It is for individual health authorities and trusts to determine local bed requirements in accordance with local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was for each NHS trust and for England as a whole for the last available two years the frequency of closure of admittance to emergency hospital beds, expressing the number of occasions of such closure as a proportion of the total number of hospital beds and indicating the percentage increase or decrease in each case. [639]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. Information on the average daily number of available beds for each NHS trust for the years 1993–94 and 1994–95 is published in "Bed availability for England", copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department maintains on the number of (a) rehabilitation, (b) convalescent, (c) respite and (d) continuing care beds available in the NHS and the private sector. [2779]

Mr. Bowis: Information collected from the national health service is published in "Bed Availability for England," copies of which are available in the Library. Data are collected by broad ward classification rather than by clinical specialty and returns are made on a financial year basis. Information from the independent sector does not identify the purpose for which beds are provided.

Chiropody Services

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to issue further instructions to health authorities on the provision of chiropody services to men aged between 60 and 65 years. [1799]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Cow's Milk

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) evaluated and (b) commissioned into the effect of cow's milk on the health of those who are intolerant to it; what consideration he has given to making lactolite available via the national health service; and what inter-departmental discussions have been held about the extension of the welfare food scheme to include alternatives to cow's milk to those on income support. [2003]

Mr. Sackville: My Department has not commissioned any specific research into cow's milk intolerance but it keeps under review the scientific literature on the general issue of food intolerance, including cow's milk intolerance. I have given no consideration to making lactolite available via the national health service. The Department has held no inter-departmental discussions about any extension of the welfare food scheme to include alternatives to cow's milk.

Family Health Services Authority, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the severance payment made to the last chief executive of Doncaster FHSA. [1785]

Mr. Malone: There was no severance payment made. The employment contract was allowed to run to expiry. On retirement, appropriate superannuation benefits were paid.

GP Lists

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to require general practitioners to provide patients whom they remove from their lists with detailed reasons for that removal. [2235]

Mr. Malone: None.

NHS Doctors

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital doctors have left the national health service in each year since 1991 who qualified (a) five years previously and (b) 10 years previously. [2278]

Mr. Malone: Data are not available in the form requested. Evidence of doctors leaving the profession prematurely is available from studies published in 1991 by Professor James Parkhouse. These studies suggested that although about 20 per cent. of doctors were not practising in the national health service five years after qualification the majority of these were not lost permanently to medicine. Many were working in short-term postings overseas to further develop their skills, while others were working in United Kingdom medical work outside the NHS, or taking short career breaks.

Support Force for Children's Residential Care

Mr. Couchman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made by the support force for children's residential care since September 1993; and if he will make a statement. [3083]

Mr. Bowis: The support force for children's residential care completed its two-year programme of activity in September 1995. It has produced a report of this work. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

This report demonstrates the significant contribution made by the support force in its two-year span. I am committed to a continuing programme of action to safeguard the future of quality residential child care as an option of choice. My Department is considering the most appropriate and effective means of taking forward and reviewing the work that the support force has started.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what legislation from his Department passed in the last five years contains provision for statutory repeal or review. [2034]

Mr. Sackville: Section 3 of the Health Authorities Act 1995 which enables district health authorities and family health services authorities to act jointly in preparation for the reorganisation of health authorities provides for that section to cease to have effect on 1 April 1996.

Small and Medium Businesses

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium enterprises. [1947]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Electro-magnetic Fields

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has commissioned into the possibility that exposure to electro-magnetic fields is a cause of cancer; and if he will make a statement. [1963]

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) on 3 November 1994 Official Report, columns 1274–5.

Community Care (Direct Payments) Bill

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make available information about the Community Care (Direct Payments) Bill in simple text and pictorial format and on audio tape for people with learning difficulties. [1967]

Mr. Bowis: A consultation document on the Community Care (Direct Payments) Bill, explaining the Bill and setting out proposals for regulations, will be published shortly. It will be available in a variety of formats.

Dudley Group of Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what stage the Dudley Group of Hospitals NHS trust's proposed capital investment plan has reached; and what further stages must be passed for it to obtain approval. [2163]

Mr. Sackville: I understand that Dudley health authority is conducting a public consultation on the implications of the proposed capital development by the Dudley Group of Hospitals NHS trust. When this is complete the trust will need to prepare and submit an outline business case to the NHS executive west midlands regional office and then, providing it is content, test the project for private finance. Assuming these stages proceed satisfactorily, the next step will be to prepare a full business case for consideration by the NHS executive headquarters who will decide whether the project needs to be submitted to HM Treasury for approval.

Video Surveillance

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations he has had with the chairman of North Staffordshire NHS trust about the use of covert video surveillance in cases of suspected child abuse; if the hospital has now terminated the practice of the covert video surveillance; for how long was it in use; and if he will make a statement. [2824]

Mr. Bowis: None. I refer the hon. Member to the trust chairman for details.

Out-sourcing Research

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated in respect of out-sourcing by (i) BUPA and (ii) other private hospital and healthcare providers for the purposes of comparison with proposals for out-sourcing under the private finance initiative; and if he will make a statement.. [2820]

Mr. Sackville: None.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those trusts with registered nursing homes indicating the numbers registered in each of the last four years.. [2777]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department maintains on the number of people moving between residential and nursing homes. [2783]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many jointly registered residential and nursing homes there have been in each region in each of the last five years.. [2420]

Mr. Bowis [holding answer 24 November 1995]: Information as recorded by local authorities on the number of residential homes registered under the terms of the Registered Homes Act 1984 for the provision of nursing care as well as residential care is shown in the table.

Hospital Discharges

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department maintains about the destination of geriatric discharges from hospital. [2781]

Mr. Bowis: The latest centrally held information, 1993–94, on the destination on discharge of patients treated by consultants in geriatric medicine in national health service hospitals in England is as follows:

Destination on discharge	Percentage
Usual residence	69.18
Deaths	17.23
NHS hospital outside district—general ward/younger physically disabled	5.70
Non-NHS institution	4.34
Local authority residential home	1.30
Temporary residence eg Hotels, residential educational institutions	1.22
NHS hospital outside district—mentally ill/handicapped ward	0.34
NHS nursing home	0.32
Not known	0.19
Special hospital	0.13

Figures do not add to 100 due to rounding.

National Health Service Assets

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to cover the transfer of national health service assets beyond the actual capital projects being financed to the management of facilities management consortia under the private finance initiative. [2822]

Mr. Sackville: National health service bodies are expected to obtain value for money from any transaction involving the sale or transfer of assets to a third party. General guidance on the disposal of national health service assets is included in the publication "Estatecode: Property Transactions—A Management Guide for NHS Trusts" published by HMSO, copies of which are available in the Library.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 26 October, ref. POH(2)4593/52. [2724]

Mr. Malone: I will write to the hon. Member.

Community Care Services

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the level of spending on community care services in each (a) district and (b) region in each of the last four years. [2778]

Mr. Bowis: The information is not currently available centrally in the form requested.

Elderly People

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made about changes in the costs of providing NHS treatments or services to elderly people (a) over the last 10 years and (b) over the next 10 years. [2782]

Mr. Bowis: The available information on the costs to the hospital and community health services of changes in the number of elderly people is contained in the departmental report. Copies of the report are available in the Library.

Chernobyl

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what contribution his Department made to the conference held by the World Health Organisation in Geneva on 20 to 25 November on the consequence of the Chernobyl accident; how his Department was represented; what British papers were submitted; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of the conference. [2775]

Mr. Sackville: At the World Health Organisation conference, on 20 to 23 November, on the consequences of the Chernobyl accident my Department was represented by an official and also by the medical assistant director of the National Radiological Protection Board who assisted in the organisation of the conference. The NRPB assistant director was a member of the technical advisory meeting held in February 1995 and the paper selection meeting in July 1995. The medical department at the NRPB has also contributed to the production of the technical summary of the international programme of the health effects of the Chernobyl accident and the forthcoming full report to be published in April 1996.

British papers were presented by Professor D. Williams of Cambridge university and Professor T. Lee of St. Andrews university, on thyroid cancer and psycho-social effects respectively.

The conference was attended by over 350 participants from 38 countries. The most important aspects were thyroid cancer, psycho-social effects and epidemiological studies. There is a real increase in childhood thyroid cancers in Belarus, the Russian Federation and the Ukraine. The conference agreed that there is a need to continue the co-ordinated international support to determine the exact nature of causation and ensure optimal therapy. The non-radiogenic psycho-social impact resulting from extensive relocation of the populations from contaminated areas has produced the most significant overall morbidity so far. Participants agreed with the need to continue with well controlled epidemiological studies of those affected.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much each NHS trust spent on non-NHS provision in each year since 1991–92. [2776]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Bed Occupancy

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department maintains on bed occupancy rates. [2780]

Mr. Sackville: Information on occupied bed days is published each year in volume 1 of "Hospital Episode Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library.

Written Answers to Questions

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Hotels

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is her Department's definition of a hotel; what representations she has received (a) for the use of the word to be brought within the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 and (b) for all hotels to be registered with the local authority; and if she will make a statement. [1266]

Mr. Sproat: There is no accepted definition of the term "hotel". In our publication "Hotels: The Consumer View" published on 14 November 1995, we used the term in its generic sense to cover all accommodation which has full or limited service, including bed and breakfast accommodation, guest houses and inns.

There have been no representations for the use of the word to be brought into the terms of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.

Opinion within the industry is divided on whether compulsory registration is the appropriate way to ensure that hotels meet a minimum standard. I believe that this is better done by means of an effective, consumer led, voluntary scheme and I have asked the English tourist board for proposals to strengthen the crown accommodation classification and grading scheme.

Football Licensing Authority

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the annual income of the Football Licensing Authority from (a) fees, (b) charges and (c) fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part time and (ii) full time; and what contribution her Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years. [2748]

Mr. Sproat: In the year ended 31 March 1995 the Football Licensing Authority received fees of £9,400; these have been paid to the Consolidated Fund via the Department of National Heritage. The authority employs nine full-time inspectors, seven full-time administrative staff and two part-time typists. The Department's grant to the authority was £870,000 in 1994–95, £860,000 in 1993–94 and £800,000 in 1992–93.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many statutory instruments her Department sponsored in the last Session of Parliament; and how many of these (a) constituted a new rule or regulation, (b) were introduced to implement European Community directives and (c) amplify the minimum standards set out in an original European Community directive. [2460]

Mr. Sproat: My Department sponsored 12 statutory instruments in the last Session of Parliament. Two of these are new regulations—the Open Spaces: Hyde Park and Regent's Park (Vehicle Parking) Regulations 1995, controlling parking in the royal parks, and the Football Spectators Seating Order 1995 extending the regulations affecting seating at football grounds. None of the statutory instruments was introduced to implement European Community directives, and none amplifies the minimum standards set out in an original European Community directive.

Sporting Events (Broadcasting)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what plans she has to prohibit the exclusive transmission of major sporting events on satellite channels; [2502]

(2) what plans she has to extend the broadcasting of major sporting events to a wider audience. [2501]

Mr. Sproat: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to his earlier question on television rights on 22 November 1995, Official Report, column 160.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for her Department in 1993–94. [1913]

Mr. Sproat: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. Departments' policy responsibilities are subject to change and can vary from year to year. My Department currently has responsibility for 0.20 per cent. of the Community's R and D budget.

National Lottery

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has to allow lottery funds for revenue support; and if she will make a statement. [2086]

Mr. Sproat: National lottery funding is already available for revenue support. The National Lottery Charities Board makes revenue grants available to caring charities. The millennium award scheme will invest in people's talent. Revenue and endowment funding is also available in association with capital projects receiving grant, where other funds cannot be found.

The Government have always made clear that the lottery is being kept under review. It is still early days. As the lottery unfolds naturally, we see it investing in human as well as physical capital.

Local Community Television

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what studies her Department has commissioned into the possible introduction of local community television using analogue technology. [2592]

Mr. Sproat: None. However, the Government are keen that local television services are allowed to develop and are considering making provision in the forthcoming broadcasting legislation.

Agency Travel

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list for each of her executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by staff of the agency (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved. [2360]

Mr. Sproat: Listed are details in respect of overseas travel for the last financial year for my two agencies.

Historic Royal Palaces Agency

3,155.00[1]	USA	Travel Trade Manager
739.00	Germany	Travel Trade Manager
4,051.00[1]	Germany	Travel Trade Manager
250.00	Barcelona, Spain	Interpretation Manager
201.40	Amsterdam, Netherlands	Member of the Textile Conservation Studio

[1] These trips were for exhibitions in which HRPA was taking part. The costs of the exhibition (including stand hire etc) and membership fees to necessary associations, are included in this figure.

The Royal Parks Agency

During the last financial year no one in the employ of the Royal Parks Agency went overseas on agency-related business.

Television Licences

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when the hon. Member for Islington South and Finsbury will receive a substantive reply to his letter of 16 August on the subject of television licences. [2722]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 27 November 1995]: My Department is looking into the issues raised in the hon. Member's letter. I hope to let him have a substantive reply shortly.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what percentage of her Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium-sized enterprises. [1951]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Neither my Department nor its agencies keep a specific record of a suppliers size. The information could therefore be obtained only by incurring disproportionate costs.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the Acts of Parliament and consolidated Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [46]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 20 November 1995, Official Report, column 21.

Risk Assessment

Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in the work of the independent panel of scientific experts on risk assessment. [2048]

Mr. Freeman: I have been asked to reply. The panel receives papers from time to time on individual topics and more general matters of principle and advises the deregulation task force. The task force's first report recommended that a risk assessment should be required for all regulatory proposals affecting business; that Ministers should be required personally to sign off all risk assessments; and that no regulatory proposals should be considered collectively by Ministers without a certificate signed by the responsible Minister that he has read the risk assessment and that he believes that the balance between cost and benefit has been approximately struck. The Government have accepted these recommendations and new guidance on risk assessment methodology for use by Government Departments is currently being developed.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department from whom his Department is seeking legal advice in relation to private finance initiative schemes. [1657]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Masons solicitors are advising the Court Service on contractual issues surrounding the local county court procurement project. No other current Departmental procurements have obtained such support.

Mr. Coe: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the MORI Survey, "Public Attitudes to Marriage, Divorce and Family Mediation," will be made available in full. [3235]

Mr. Taylor: The survey was conducted as part of the detailed process of consultation on the divorce reform proposals. The results of the survey were considered in the White Paper, "Looking to the Future-Mediation and the Ground for Divorce," Cm 2799, published in April this year, and were included in the summary of the consultation analysis published at the same time. The survey has been made available in full today, and copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the estimated cost of the legal advice his Department is seeking in relation to private finance initiative schemes; and on what terms that advice is being sought. [1658]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Legal advice to the local county court—LOCCS procurement project is likely to cost up to £25,000. The contract with Masons is subject to normal departmental terms and conditions.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Testing

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the United Kingdom ambassador to the United Nations voted on the draft resolution in committee on 17 November concerning proposals to oppose nuclear testing; what consideration underlay the vote; and if he will list the nations which voted with the United Kingdom on the draft resolution. [2735]

Mr. David Davis: The United Kingdom voted against the resolution. We do not believe that the current testing programmes are inconsistent with commitments made by the nuclear weapon states at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference. We have made clear that it would be hypocritical and wrong for us to condemn the French decision to undertake a final limited series of tests, based on scientific advice that these tests are necessary to preserve the safety and reliability of French nuclear weapons. We regret that the resolution failed to mention either the good progress made towards achieving a comprehensive test ban treaty, or the commitment of all five nuclear weapon states to conclude these negotiations no later than 1996. Eleven other countries voted with the United Kingdom; 45 abstained and 33 did not take part in the vote. The full list of votes has been placed in the Library of the House.

Gibraltar

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what extra equipment has been purchased recently for the Royal Gibraltar police to combat drugs and tobacco smuggling. [2666]

Mr. David Davis: Equipment provided to the Royal Gibraltar police over the last 12 months to combat drugs and tobacco smuggling includes technical equipment, vehicles and spares, computer equipment, a fast patrol launch and night vision goggles.

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the reasons for the early termination of the contract of the Gibraltar Attorney-General. [2569]

Mr. Davis: Mr. Blackburn-Gittings, former Attorney-General of Gibraltar, decided to resign because a difference of views arose between himself and the governor.

EU Commissioners (Earnings)

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the rules covering outside earnings and the public disclosure of income for members of the Commission of the European Communities. [2729]

Mr. David Davis: Article 157 of the European Community treaty states that the members of the Commission may not, during their term of office, engage in any other occupation, whether gainful or not.

International Peacekeeping

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding international peacekeeping efforts; and if he will make a statement. [827]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The United Kingdom is in constant dialogue with the United Nations, and other international organisations, on a wide range of peacekeeping issues. As the second largest troop contributor to the United Nations peacekeeping operations, with troops in four separate missions, we continue to take an active part in discussions to develop international peacekeeping capabilities.

BBC World Service

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans there are for funding the BBC World Service in the last year of the current triennium. [3095]

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will write to the hon. Member immediately after the Budget statement.

International Sanctions

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken and on what dates, to freeze the personal accounts or assets of members of regimes with whom the United Kingdom are in dispute as part of a national or international sanctions policy. [2565]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The United Kingdom has no unilateral sanctions in place against the assets or personal accounts of foreign regimes. However, we do implement the mandatory financial sanctions imposed by the UN Security Council. Such financial sanctions are in place against Iraq, in UNSCR 661 adopted on 6 August 1990, and against Libya in UNSCR 863 adopted on 11 November 1993.

The financial sanctions imposed on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in UNSCRs 757 and 820 adopted on 30 May 1992 and 17 April 1993, respectively were suspended with immediate effect by UNSCR 1022 adopted on 22 November, with the exception that certain assets frozen or impounded by UNSCRs 757 and 820 shall remain frozen or impounded. A copy of UNSCR 1022 is available in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he is satisfied with the existing measures to ensure that specified bovine offals do not enter the human food chain. [3372]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The controls in place require the specified bovine offals, the potentially BSE infected tissues, to be removed from all cattle at slaughter and be destroyed. These controls are kept under continual review. The independent spongiform encephalopathy advisory committee again looked at all the controls to protect public health from any remote theoretical risk from BSE at its meeting on 23 November. It concluded:

> "Earlier in 1995 SEAC had concluded that 'provided in the slaughtering process the removal of the spinal cord was done properly, the mechanically recovered meat (MRM) process was safe and there was no reason for the Committee to change its advice'.
> In the light of the current audit reports [reported to Parliament in my answer to the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) on 22 November (Official Record columns 192–193)] showing failure to remove parts of the spinal cord in a small number of carcases the Committee expressed its grave concern.
> It noted the further tightening up of controls but felt that unless and until it was clear that the removal of SBO, particularly spinal cord, was now being undertaken properly in all cases it would be prudent, as a precaution, to suspend the use of vertebrae from cattle aged over six months, in the production of MRM."

Taking account of practical considerations, I have decided to make regulations which would prohibit the use of bovine vertebral column from cattle of any age in mechanically recovered meat. Most MRM is made from poultry, pig and sheep meat and the committee therefore made no recommendation for any other action in respect of products containing MRM. The committee also reiterated its advice that beef, including cuts such as rib of beef and T-bone steak that include backbone, was a safe product.

I must emphasise that these, like all our controls on BSE, are precautionary measures and that there is no evidence of a link between BSE and the human disease Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease.

Research and Development

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the indicative contributions to the EU budget in respect of research and development for his Department in 1993–94. [1910]

Mr. Boswell: Table 2.1 of the statistical supplement to the "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology" contains indicative figures for the United Kingdom's contributions to the EC budget in respect of research and development. Departments' policy responsibilities are subject to change and can vary from year to year. My Department currently has responsibility for 3.93 per cent. of the Community's R and D budget.

Badger Setts, Paignton Zoo

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many badger setts there are known to be in the boundaries of Paignton zoo; how many of these have been interfered with; in respect of how many a licence to interfere has been issued; and for what reasons the licences were issued. [2277]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the letter I sent him on 11 May 1995; there has been no change in the situation.

Apples

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the likely timetable for decisions in European Community negotiations about the definition of co-operatives or producer organisations with particular reference to the intervention regime for apples; what are his objectives in these negotiations; and if decisions will be taken by majority voting; [2436]

(2) what is the timetable for likely decisions in European Community negotiations about the intervention regime for apples; what are his objectives in these negotiations; and whether decisions will be taken by majority voting. [2437]

Mr. Boswell: I understand that the Spanish presidency hopes to reach agreement at the December Council of Agriculture Ministers. Any decisions will be taken by qualified majority voting.

Our objectives include seeking a clear signal that intervention will come to an end altogether. We will also seek to ensure that the recognition criteria for producer organisations do not discriminate against those which exist in the United Kingdom.

Farming (New Entrants)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations his Department has received on the subject of offering financial assistance to new entrants into farming in the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [2528]

Mr. Boswell: A number of suggestions have been made to the Department for supporting new entrants to farming. These include modifications to the taxation regime, lower interest rates, quota allocation arrangements and the introduction of assistance under EC regulation 2328/91. This measure enables member states to provide assistance in the form of installation premia or interest rate subsidies on loans for new farms; it has not been taken up in the United Kingdom. We believe that such measures are more appropriate in cases where member states' inheritance laws may lead to the breaking up of agricultural holdings and hence the need for additional infrastructure investment to maintain viability. In the UK, holdings tend to pass intact from one generation to the next. Our recent deregulatory steps on tenancy reform, in the Agriculture Tenancies Act 1995, are designed to encourage new entrants to farming, and have been widely welcomed across the industry.

Crofting

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on low intensity croft farming; and if he will list the pilot schemes his Department has assessed. [2572]

Mr. Boswell: Crofting is not a system of farming which is practised in England. The Department has not therefore made any assessment of its impact.

Poultry (Gas Stunning)

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be able to lift the prohibition on the gas stunning of poultry. [2114]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The killing of poultry by exposure to specified gas mixtures has been permitted since 1 April 1995 under the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995.

Ostrich Farms

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to monitor and control ostrich farms. [2161]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The State Veterinary Service inspects ostrich farms in Great Britain to check that the welfare standards are satisfactory. A total of 23 welfare inspections have been made since 1 April 1994. In making the inspections, the state veterinary service takes account of the guidelines on the welfare of ostriches prepared by the Farm Animal Welfare Council.

Alport Dale

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if English Nature has stated any formal objection to Forest Enterprise's proposals for Alport dale. [2377]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Yes. Forest Enterprise is now reviewing its proposals and is, jointly with English Nature, developing a management plan for the land within the sites of special scientific interest.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what options are being considered as alternatives to putting underground the electricity line supplying Alport Hamlet; and what is the estimated cost of each of these options. [2375]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: It is for Yorkshire Electricity to decide what options to consider.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many letters of objection have been received by (a) the Peak Park joint planning board and (b) the Forestry Authority opposing Forest Enterprise's proposals for Alport dale; and on what dates his Department received these figures. [2376]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: I have no current information on the number of letters of objection received by the Peak Park joint planning board. The Forestry Authority arm of the Forestry Commission has received two letters opposing the proposals.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the annual saving to business which will accrue from the deregulation of the (a) Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1868, (b) Slaughterhouses Act 1974 and Slaughter of Animals (Scotland) Act 1980 and (c) Corn Returns Act 1882 Orders 1995. [2025]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The annual saving to business accruing from deregulation of the Acts at (b) above has been estimated to be in the region of £100,000. This relates to the reduction of licensing-registration requirements in respect of slaughterhouses. Other benefits and non-recurring cost savings for business are detailed in the explanatory document which accompanies the draft deregulation order. The annual cost saving to business accruing from deregulation of the Corn Returns Act 1882 (c) has been estimated at £100,000. As regards the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1968, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is responsible for this legislation.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the costs involved in preparing the cost-benefit assessment contained in the explanatory memorandum for the deregulation of the (a) Slaughterhouses Act 1974 and Slaughter of Animals (Scotland) Act 1980, (b) Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1868 and (c) Corn Returns Act 1882 Orders 1995. [2026]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The costs associated with the identification of the cost savings to business and other benefits arising from the proposed amendments to the Slaughterhouses Act 1974 and the Slaughter of Animals (Scotland) Act 1980, and the Corn Returns Act 1882 have not been estimated. As regards the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1868, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is responsible for this legislation.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of his Department's expenditure in 1994–95 was spent on procuring goods or services from small and medium-sized enterprises. [1960]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The information requested is not available for 1994–95. In the current year, MAFF cannot separately identify medium-sized suppliers, but small businesses are being identified and the relevant information regarding the Ministry's spend with such enterprises during 1995–96 will be sent to the hon. Member in due course.

MAFF's executive agencies do not maintain records regarding the size of their supplier companies.

Local Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the Acts of Parliament and Consolidation Acts that affect local government that have been introduced by his Department since January 1994. [30]

Mr. Boswell [pursuant to his reply, 21 November 1995 c. 79]: My earlier reply should have made clear that the Land Drainage Act 1994 was introduced by the Earl of Lindsay, and was supported by the Government.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Photography

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what proposals the Commission has for allowing photography in the Commons. [676]

Mr. Michael J. Martin [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The Administration Committee reviewed the regulations governing filming and photography in the Palace of Westminster earlier this year and no amendments were considered necessary.

TREASURY

Local Government Finance, Nottinghamshire

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received about the financial settlement for Nottinghamshire county council in 1996–97; if he will summarise these representations; and if he will list the individuals and organisations that have sent them. [2755]

Mr. Waldegrave: The Treasury has received representations from a number of individuals and organisations concerning the financial settlement for Nottinghamshire county council for 1996–97.

Private Finance Panel

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the members of the private finance panel, their remit and the interests they have been required to declare. [3087]

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 1 November to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), Official Report, columns 260–61.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much private capital has been invested in public investment projects since the 1992 autumn statement. [84]

Mr. Jack: Over £16 billion by the end of 1995–96, including over £1 billion under the private finance initiative.

European Communities (Fraud)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what actions have been taken in the last 12 months to combat fraud and maladministration within the European communities. [170]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: At the Essen European Council on 9 and 10 December 1994, the Prime Minister made a number of proposals to help tackle fraud, waste and mismanagement. These included a requirement that each member state should report on what it is doing to combat fraud against the community Budget on its own territory. Member states have now submitted their reports and the Commission has produced a framework for further work which will be considered by the Madrid European Council on 15 and 16 December.

Separately, the new Commission has centralised anti-fraud work within its services, in particular reinforcing its anti-fraud unit and extending its remit.

Full details of developments in this area will be published in the next "Annual Statement on European Finances". The Commission also publishes an annual report on the fight against fraud.

Single European Currency

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the cost to business of converting equipment and systems in the event of the United Kingdom joining a single European currency; and if he will make a statement. [1572]

Mrs. Angela Knight: If the UK participates in stage 3 of economic and monetary union, there will be transitional costs to business associated with the changeover to the single currency. The Government do not have an assessment of the potential size of these costs, because no decision has been taken as to whether the UK will join the single currency, and costs would depend on decisions taken individual businesses.

European Union (Gross National Products)

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the gross national product per head of population in each of the member states of the European Union for the last year for which comparable figures are available. [1811]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information for these countries is available in the OECD publication "National Accounts", available in the House of Commons Library.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many estates in each county in England inheritance tax was paid in each year since its introduction. [2244]

Mr. Jack: The information is not available at county level.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many estates in each county in England were allowed conditional exemption from inheritance tax in each year its introduction. [2247]

Mr. Jack: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Enterprise Centre of Europe

Mr. Legg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the position of the United Kingdom as an enterprise centre of Europe. [1348]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 23 November 1995]: The Government will continue to create the economic conditions where business can flourish by further encouraging enterprise and competitiveness, through the development and growth of small and large businesses alike and promoting further deregulation. Our firm financial policies directed towards low inflation on a permanent basis and sound public finances, together with our intention to reduce the share of national income taken by public spending will help us to achieve this.

Unemployment, London

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the level of unemployment amongst ethnic minority (a) men and (b) women in each of the London boroughs; and how many are in (i) full-time employment and (ii) part-time employment. [2732]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The most recent available information is from the 1991 census of population, and can be obtained from the NOMIS data base in the Library.

Fuels

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the retail prices and the tax elements of the ranges of petrol, liquified petroleum gas and diesel fuels, including the reduced pollution varieties, for motor vehicles. [2144]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Average retail selling prices and the respective tax elements are as follows:

	RSP pence per litre	Total Tax as percentage of RSP	Excise Duty as percentage of RSP	VAT As percentage of RSP	Excise Duty in per pence litre	VAT In pence per litre
Leaded	57.79	77.43	62.54	14.89	36.14	8.61
Super unleaded[1]	58.52	68.41	53.52	14.89	31.32	8.72
Unleaded	51.56	75.64	60.74	14.89	31.32	7.68
Diesel	52.01	75.11	60.22	14.89	31.32	7.75
City diesel[2]	51.4	75.83	60.93	14.89	31.32	7.66
LPG auto[3]	42.0	54.35	39.45	14.89	16.57	6.26

[1] The most recent RSP available for super unleaded is for September 1995.
[2] The small market in this product is dominated by one supermarket chain which retails it at 2 pence per litre more than its own price for normal diesel. This latter price is considerably lower than the average price for diesel shown in the table.
[3] This RSP is very much a 'best estimate' by the LPG Association. All other figures are correct for 20 November 1995.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the cost of the VAT exemption for cultural activities. [2504]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It would be premature to do so. The outcome of the recent consultation exercise on the scope of an exemption for certain cultural services is still under consideration.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has as to the cost of the VAT exemption to voluntary sports clubs, including the interest paid on overcharged VAT. [2506]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The total amounts refunded to non-profit-making organisations supplying sporting services are estimated at £140 million plus £30 million interest.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost of the VAT exemption for sports centres with charitable status. [2505]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No separate figures are available.

Deregulation

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the deregulation measures agreed by his Department during 1995. [285]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 22 November 1995]: The Chancellor's Departments have introduced a large number of deregulatory measures during 1995. Among the most significant are the orders which the Treasury has laid before Parliament, under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, to provide new flexibility in the operation of building societies, credit unions and friendly societies respectively. The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise, together with the Contributions Agency, have developed closer working relations. This has resulted in, for example, trials of a new shared telephone helpline, together with a joint notification form and leaflet for businesses starting up. Initiatives undertaken by the Central Statistical Office, which are being co-ordinated under a new compliance planning system, include reductions in duplication between surveys, and simplification of the forms sent to business.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Internal Market Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Internal Market Council, held on 23 November, giving details of all votes and all decisions which were determined by unanimity or without dissension. [1599]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 27 November 1995]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the deputy UK permanent representative represented the UK at the Internal Market Council in Brussels on 23 November.

The council reached unanimous political agreement on the customs 2000 programme on which Germany abstained, and on the flavourings directive, on which France abstained. The required simple majority were in favour of the directive on collection of statistical information in the field of tourism, which Germany opposed. Political agreement was reached on the draft directives amending public procurement directives, though a common position awaits the European Parliament's opinion.

The council also agreed common positions on the pressure equipment directive, on which Italy abstained, and on the motor-cycle multi chapter directive, which Austria opposed. Although the UK voted against, political agreement was reached on the mineral water proposal. Denmark and Sweden also voted against and the Netherlands abstained.

There was also an informal lunchtime discussion with Ministers from central and eastern European countries.

Women and Ethnic Minority Staff

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of (a) women and (b) ethnic minorities are employed in the highest 10 per cent. of paid staff in his Department. [1515]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 November 1995]: The figures for the DTI, excluding its executive agencies, are as follows:

Breakdown of top 10 per cent. salary earners in DTI (excluding its executive agencies)

	Number	Percentage
Women	78	15.0
Staff of ethnic minority origin	13	2.5
Total number of staff	521	—

The figures exclude casual staff and staff currently out of the Department. The figures do not take account of staff transferring to the DTI from the Cabinet Office and the former Employment Department in the latest machinery of government changes.

The chief executives of the following executive agencies will respond direct to the hon. Member—Companies House, the Insolvency Service, the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, the National Weights and Measures Laboratory, the Patent Office and the Radiocommunications Agency.

Letter from David Durham to Mrs. Margaret Beckett, dated 28 November 1995:

You tabled a Parliamentary Question regarding the percentage of women and ethnic minorities employed in the highest 10% of staff in DTI. I have been asked to reply to you directly as Chief Executive of Companies House Executive Agency.

The total number of staff in Companies House as at 23 November 1995 was 1087 on headcount and 937 on full time equivalent. The percentage of women employed in the highest 10% of paid staff is 28%, and of ethnic minorities employed in the highest 10% of paid staff is 5.5 %.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mrs. Margaret Beckett, dated 28 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about the percentage of women and ethnic minorities employed in the highest 10% of paid staff in The Insolvency Service.

The relevant figures at 20 November were:

Number of permanent staff	Females in highest 10% of paid staff	Ethnic minorities in highest 10% of paid staff
1,411	14–9.9%	10–7.1%

Letter from R. D. Worswick to Mrs. Margaret Beckett, dated 20 November 1995:

I have been asked to answer your question PQ26N to the President of the Board of Trade tabled on 16 November 1995 with respect to the Laboratory of the Government Chemist.

Of the highest 10% of paid staff employed at the Laboratory of the Government Chemist, 4% are women and 4% are from ethnic minorities.

Letter from Seton Bennett to Mrs. Margaret Beckett, dated 28 November 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory to your question about the employment of women and ethnic minorities in the highest 10 per cent of paid staff.

There are no women or ethnic minorities employed at that level in the National Weights and Measures Laboratory.

Letter from P. R. S. Hartnack to Mrs. Margaret Beckett, dated 28 November 1995:

You asked for information about the percentage of women and ethnic minorities employed in the highest 10% of paid staff in the Department of Trade and Industry. This reply covers the Patent Office which is an Executive Agency of the Department.

The relevant information is that the Patent Office has 88 staff in the top 10% salary bracket. Of these, 4.5% are women and none are from ethnic minorities.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mrs. Margaret Beckett, dated 28 November 1995:

I am replying on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency to your written question to the President of the Board of Trade about the percentage of women and ethnic minority staff employed in the highest 10% of paid staff in the Agency.

To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of (a) women and b) ethnic minorities are employed in the highest 10% of paid staff in his Department.

Of the highest 10% of paid staff in the Agency, women and staff from ethnic backgrounds account for 4% each.

Disused Mineshafts

Mr. Berry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken to ensure the accuracy of the Coal Authority's records of disused mineshafts in the Kingswood parliamentary constituency. [2941]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for the Coal Authority.

Export Licences (Guatemala)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade under which EG(C)O category the licence issued for export of arms and ammunition to Guatemala between 1 January and 31 August 1995 falls. [2422]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 24 November 1995]: Earlier this year, there were placed in the Library of the House detailed statistical analyses of exported licences which were granted for military, paramilitary and security equipment in the calendar years 1993 and 1994. These analyses included all countries of destination for which these licences were issued, including Guatemala. Early in 1996, I intend to place in the Library of the House a similar analysis for the full calendar year 1995. I shall write to the hon. Member when this is done.

Export Licences (Nigeria)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what British companies have applied for export licences to supply arms to Nigeria in each year since 1993. [2876]

Mr. Oppenheim: It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to reveal details of export licences or applications for licences unless the requirements of commercial confidentiality are outweighed by the public interest.

Post Office Closures

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many closures of post offices in rural areas have been notified to his Department in the past five years. [2651]

Mr. Oppenheim: In September 1990 there were 10,166 post offices in rural areas. In September 1995 there were 9,494.

Defence Exports

Mr. Duncan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of British exports is defence related. [882]

Mr. Oppenheim: Goods identified as being defence equipment accounted for 1.3 per cent. of British exports in 1994.

Irish Steel Ltd.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the conformity of state aid to Irish Steel Ltd. with the provision of the treaty of Paris and EU policy. [2835]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The Commission's proposal to authorise state assistance to Irish Steel contains a proposal for financial assistance which is not permitted by either article 4(c) of the treaty of Paris or the steel aid code. The Commission has therefore requested a derogation from the steel aid rules under article 95 (ECSC), which is subject to the unanimous assent of the Council of Ministers.

Nigerian-British Society

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations his Department has received and what meetings it has had with the Nigerian-British Society since November 1993; and if he will make a statement. [2814]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 27 November 1995]: My Department has not had any contact with the Nigerian-British Society.

Training Schools (Textile Businesses)

Mr. Orme: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what funds are available for textile businesses in the north-west to set up training schools. [2883]

Mr. Eggar: There are no funds directly available to textile businesses to set up training schools. Training facilities are available to support the textile industry in colleges in the north-west. Their provision is kept under review by the Further Education Funding Council in consultation with north-west training and enterprise councils, which are responsible for assessing the local labour market needs.

Consortex

Mr. Orme: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what grant was made to Consortex in the last year; and how it has been spent. [2884]

Mr. Eggar: A sum of £92,500 of European funding under the RETEX programme was awarded to Consortex in the last year. Of that amount, £12,835 was spent on staff costs in respect of work carried out before the project was terminated. Attempts are being made to re-allocate the balance.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the outturn figures for regional selective assistance (a) offers and (b) payments for 1994–95; and if he will indicate how these figures relate to the original budgeted plans. [2108]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 24 November 1995]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 23 November 1995, Official Report, column 255. These publications also provide information on offers.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the average time taken by each integrated regional office to process regional selective assistance grants to (a) all businesses and (b) small and medium enterprises in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will list the minimum and maximum time taken by those offices. [1928]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Reliable data are not available on the size of businesses applying for grant. The figures provided for small and medium-size enterprises relate to firms with grant applications for less than £1 million. Processing times are based on decision taken during 1994–95.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the total sum paid in regional selective assistance to (a) British-owned firms and (b) foreign-owned firms, (i) where firms had 0 to 9 employees, (ii) where firms had 10 to 49 employees, (iii) where firms had 50 to 99 employees, (iv) where firms had 100 to 249 employees, (v) where firms had 250 to 499 employees and (vi) where firms had more than 500 employees, indicating for each category what proportion this constituted of the total awarded for each financial year since 1990–91. [1929]

Mr. Page [holding answer 27 November 1995]: Reliable data are not available on the size of businesses applying for grant. The figures provided are based on the size of the grant requested.

Restrictive Practices (Retail Newsagents)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will undertake a review of the workings of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 as far as retail newsagents are concerned; and if he will make a statement. [2089]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 is designed to prevent agreements restricting competition and acting against the public interest. I see no reason to treat retail newsagent differently from others

Statutory Fees and Charges

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the annual income from (a) fees, (b) charges and (c) Companies House fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part-time and (ii) full-time and what contribution his Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years in respect of (1) Companies House, (2) the Radio Communications Agency, (3) the Office of Fair Trading, (4) the Export Licensing Unit, (5) the National Weights and Measures Laboratory and (6) the Engineering Inspectorate. [2741]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The amount of statutory fees and charges that were appropriated in aid of my Department's gross running cost provision in 1994–95 was £37.8 million. The late filing penalties collected by my Department's Companies House executive agency amounted to £16.7 million in the same period. These are treated as Consolidated Fund extra receipts and are therefore surrendered to the Treasury.

The information requested on total staff numbers is set out in the table: Disaggregated figures for (4) are not available.

	1992–93		1993–94		1994–95
	Full-time	Part-time	Full-time	Part-time	Full-time	Part-time
Companies House	917	356	880	347	878	340
Radiocommunications Agency	526	[1]—	534	[1]—	541	[1]—
Export Licensing Unit	Disaggregated information is not available
National Weights and Measures Laboratory	44	7	40	8	41	8
Engineering Inspectorate	7	0	7	0	[2]7	0

[1] Part-time figures for the Radiocommunications Agency could only be provided at disproportionate cost.
[2] The number of full-time staff in the Engineering Inspectorate in 1994–95 reduced from 7 to 6 after 30 November 1994.

With the exception of my Department's funding of the late filing penalties scheme administered by the Companies House agency, no contributions have been made to its or the Radiocommunications Agency annual running costs in the past three years. This is because Companies House was established as an off-vote trading fund in October 1991, and the Radiocommunications Agency has retained its income to offset against its running cost expenditure since becoming a net controlled agency in April 1990. The Office of Fair Trading is independent of my Department. It is not funded from the DTI's vote. The information requested in respect of (5) and (6) is set out in the table: Disaggregated figures for (4) are not available.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the annual saving which will accrue to business from the deregulation (a) Fair Trading Act 1973 Amendment, Merger Reference Time Limits Order 1995, (b) Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 (Amendments) Variation of Exempt Agreements Order 1995, (c) Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 (Amendment) Time Limits Order 1995 and (d) Resolutions of Private Companies Order 1995; and what were the costs involved in repairing the cost-benefit assessment contained in the explanatory memorandum in respect of each. [2027]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 27 November 1995]: The estimates of cost savings have been considered in the respective explanatory documents. For the first two orders, savings are not readily quantifiable but include savings in management time, the cost of legal advice, and, for the second order, the potentially high cost of remaking an entire agreement; for the third order, the estimated saving is around £100,000 per year. All three orders provide substantial benefits for business by reducing uncertainty or the consequences of accidental error or oversight. The fourth order will also bring significant but not precisely quantifiable savings from speedier decision-taking, including reduced administrative and legal costs. Each cost-benefit assessment derived from the mandatory consultation with business and other interested bodies. The costs involved in preparing them were the normal costs of officials' time associated with any such exercise.

National Coal Board Superannuation Fund

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the President of the Board of Trade who are the new trustees of the NCB superannuation fund; what are their qualifications and backgrounds; what they are each being paid as trustees; and who selected them. [2495]

Mr. Page: The current trustees of the British Coal staff superannuation scheme are:

Mrs. S. Gleig (chairman)
R. Dennis
D. Brandrick
M. Atkinson
P. McNestry
B. Chappell
D. McIntosh
B. Hancock

Mrs. Gleig and Mr. Dennis are professional pensions managers from the TSB and the John Lewis Partnership respectively. Mr. Brandrick was formerly secretary of the British Coal Corporation. Mr. Atkinson is an assistant secretary in the DTI. All the above have been selected and appointed by me, in accordance with the scheme's rules.

Mr. McNestry is General Secretary of the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers. Mr. Chappell is a treasurer of the British Association of Colliery Management. Each has been appointed as trustee by his union.

Mr. McIntosh is a former senior accountant with British Coal. Mr. Hancock is General Secretary of the south Wales area of NACODS. Both were elected trustees by ballots of scheme members in their respective areas in September 1995.

Mrs. Gleig, as chairman, receives remuneration of £15,000 per annum. No remuneration is currently paid to other trustees.

European Funds (East Midlands)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what delays have occurred in the handling of bids for European funds at the Government office for the east midlands; and what are the reasons for these delays. [2758]

Mr. Oppenheim: Delays to agreeing single programming documents with the European Commission have accounted for the majority of time lost to dealing with bids for European structural funds under the programmes administered by the Government Office for the east midlands. Such delays are similar to those experienced by objective 2 and objective 5b programmes across the country. Offers of European social funds and European regional development funds are now beginning to flow on all east midlands mainstream programmes.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what timetable the Government office for the east midlands has set out to deal with the RECHAR II programme; and when successful projects will be announced. [2757]

Mr. Oppenheim: Two funds contribute to the RECHAR II programme: the European regional development fund and the European social fund.

The deadline for first-round east midlands ERDF RECHAR II applications is 31 December 1995. A total of £10.3 million will be available. The exact timetable for announcing successful projects will depend on the number of bids received and the degree of competition for funds. It is anticipated that the working group to consider ERDF project bids will first meet in March 1996 and that the Government office will make its first formal offers shortly afterwards. A second bidding round for an ERDF allocation of £9.1 million will have a deadline of 31 May 1996.

The position with the ESF is more complex. Because of delays to the RECHAR II programme, it is likely that there will be no ESF bidding round in 1995. The Government have sought a derogation from the European Commission from rules preventing their making retrospective awards of 1995 ESF allocations in 1996. Although no official decision has been received, we understand that such a derogation is unlikely. In this case, 1995 ESF allocations will be rolled forward into 1996 giving a total fund of up to £4.1 million. The closing date for bids for this tranche will be 19 January 1996. The timetable for announcing successful ESF projects will be similar to that for ERDF.

Medical Examination

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total number of miners and former miners examined under the PD12D regulations from September 1993 to date, broken down for each region. [1402]

Mr. Roger Evans: I have been asked to reply.

The information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 28 November 1995. [1493]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minster if he will discuss with the UN Security Council the offer by the Government of Libya of a trial in The Hague of two Libyan suspects accused of the destruction of Pan Am 103. [1637]

The Prime Minister: At its 11th review of sanctions against Libya, held on 22 November, the UK's permanent representative reminded the Security Council that proposals for the trial of the Lockerbie suspects in The Hague or elsewhere were unacceptable alternatives to trial in Scotland or the United States.

Disabled People (Policies)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Prime Minister which minister has the overall responsibility for co-ordinating policies in relation to access to the built environment for people with disabilities throughout all Government Departments; and if he will make a statement. [3012]

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Social Security and Disabled People is the focal point for issues affecting disabled people.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to visit the Czech Republic in the next 12 months. [2514]

The Prime Minister: I look forward to having the opportunity to visit the Czech Republic, but as yet have no firm plans.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister when he last met President Clerides of Cyprus; and what issues on Cyprus were discussed. [845]

The Prime Minister: I have met President Clerides on several occasions in recent months. We had a substantive discussion at No. 10 this year, addressing the range of issues affecting the UK and Cyprus.

We met again at the VE day commemoration in May, at the Cannes European Council in June, and again at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting earlier this month.

TRANSPORT

Railtrack

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the representations he has received regarding the level of track access charges levied by Railtrack; and if he will make a statement. [472]

Mr. Watts: The approval of access charges is a matter for the Rail Regulator.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much money has been received by Railtrack in track access charges for each operating division area of British Rail and for the corporation as a whole; and if he will make a statement. [474]

Mr. Watts: In 1994–95 Railtrack's access related income from passenger train operators was £1,995.2 million and freight revenue was £191.1 million.

The Rail Regulator has decided that track access agreements available for public inspection should exclude details of access charges in line with his duties under section 72 (3) of the Railways Act 1993. Consistent with this policy Railtrack does not publish income figures by train operator.

Chiltern Trains

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the cancellation of rail tours in Wales by Chiltern Trains; and if he will make a statement. [473]

Mr. Watts: The Department received a number of representations about Chiltern Trains last year. The cancellation of rail tours is a commercial matter for Chiltern Trains.

Departmental Cars

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total cost of chauffeur driven cars used by this Department for each of the last five years. [419]

Mr. Norris: Expenditure on chauffeur driven cars was as follows:

Financial Year	£
1990–91	236,746
1991–92	280,200
1992–93	340,846
1993–94	345,138
1994–95	356,599

Figures include VAT.

Deregulation

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the effects of bus deregulation in the last ten years. [2833]

Mr. Norris: Bus deregulation continues to be a great success. Recent statistics confirm the continuing trend of more operators running more bus miles at lower cost and involving significantly less public subsidy than previously. In addition, the long term decline in bus patronage appears to have begun to flatten out.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what were the costs involved in preparing the cost-benefit assessment contained in the explanatory memorandum for the Deregulation (Parking Equipment) Order 1995; [2880]

(2) what is the estimated annual saving to business from the Deregulation (Parking Equipment) Order 1995. [2882]

Mr. Watts: The assessment of benefits to business and administrative cost savings was developed in the course of consultation. The cost of preparing this assessment cannot be identified separately.

The order will bring savings in costs and other benefits to business as a result of reduced delay in introducing new equipment and the removal of a disincentive to innovation. However, it has not been possible to quantify these benefits.

Executive Agencies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the Driving Standards Agency's annual income from (a) fees, (b) charges and (c) fines; what was the total number of staff employed (i) part-time and (ii) full-time; and what contribution his Department has made towards the annual running costs in each of the past three years in respect of (1) the Driving Standards Agency, (2) the Civil Aviation Authority, (3) the Vehicle Inspectorate, (4) the Vehicle Certification Agency, (5) the Traffic Commissioners office and (6) the Surveyor Generals Organisation. [2744]

Mr. Norris: In 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95 the Driving Standards Agency's income from fees and charges was £47.2 million, £50.2 million, and £54.8 million respectively. This income is treated as extra receipts payable to the Consolidated Fund. DSA does not receive income from fines. In the same years the agency employed 1,867, 1,783, and 1,728 full-time staff; 267, 285 and 289 part-time staff; and, in 1994–95, 31 driving examiners on a contract basis.

The size of the running costs contributions made by the Department depends on the nature of the financial regime under which the organisations operate. VI, DSA and VCA cover most of their expenditure through fees collected from services provided. My Department's contributions in 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95 were nil in the case of VCA and VI, although the Department did purchase enforcement and other services from VI and VCA at a cost of £16.1 million, £15.3 million, and £15.1 million respectively. My Department made contributions of £1.6 million, £1.5 million, and £1.5 million to DSA; £11.9 million, £12.0 million and £11.4 million to the Traffic Commissioners' offices; and £14.1 million, £14.9 million and £14.9 million to the Surveyor General's Organisation which became an executive agency on 1 April 1994 under the new title of the Marine Safety Agency.

The Civil Aviation Authority is a nationalised industry and my Department makes no contribution towards its running costs.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of his executive agencies for the last financial year in respect of overseas travel by staff of the agency (a) the cost, (b) the countries visited and (c) the posts held by the staff involved. [2359]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is in the table.

Road Programme

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those schemes in the national road programme for which statutory pre-construction procedures have been completed and orders have been made, the dates on which the orders were made and the dates on which they will expire. [1809]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Alan Howarth, dated 28 November 1995.

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, if he will list those schemes in the national road programme for which statutory pre-construction procedures have been completed and orders have been made, the dates on which the orders were made and the dates on which they will expire.

The relevant schemes are listed below together with the dates when the Compulsory Purchase Orders were made. Notices to Treat, warning interested parties that the Highways Agency intends to exercise its powers, have to be served within 3 years from the date of making of such orders.

M4 (Heavy Loads)

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the nature and the laden weight of the heavy loads notified to his Department which have created bottlenecks on the east-bound M4 on each of the last three Tuesdays; where the loads originated and terminated; how long they were on the M4 and at what speed they travelled; for what reasons they were not transported at night; who owns the loads; what costs associated with the escorts and delays are met by (a) the transporter and (b) the owner; how many more similar loads are planned; what (i) warnings and (ii) advice were given to motorists by his Department on avoiding the delays; at what times future similar loads will be on the M4; and what assessment has been made of potential road damage. [2730]

Mr. Norris: The loads in question are electrical generating equipment for a new power station at the National Power plc site at Didcot in Oxfordshire. The weights of the loads vary between 135.6 tonnes and 455 tonnes. They originated at Siemens factories in Germany and entered the United Kingdom at Avonmouth docks. Each load is timed to minimise both inconvenience to other road users and the overall cost to the project. The journeys from the docks to the power station site consist of two night-time moves and a day-time move conducted outside the peak traffic hours on the M4. The day-time movement is required because all other traffic has to be stopped when two particular bridges are traversed and the police rightly believe that this can be done safely only in hours of daylight. The loads are restricted to a maximum speed of 12 mph, but in practice the speed and therefore the time taken is limited by the gradients on the roads. A further 17 loads are planned over the next 11 months. They are required to be carried on multiple axle trailers to minimise the potential damage to roads and highways structures.

Contractual arrangements and costs are a matter between National Power plc as the customer and Siemens plc as the supplier; they, rather than public funds, have met the cost both of assessing structures on the route and the police escorting the loads.

I am satisfied that National Power and the police forces involved on the route have provided satisfactory advance notice including warnings broadcast on national and local radio, advertisements in local media, notification to the main road haulage and passenger transport groups and the provision of recorded information on a free telephone number–0800 241 504.

Changes between years largely reflect changes in the Government car service charges to recover the full economic cost of the service.

ENVIRONMENT

Government-owned Empty Properties

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the total number of empty residential properties owned by each Government Department, together with the average length of time that these properties have been empty; and what were the equivalent figures for last year. [315]

Mr. Curry: My reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) on 23 November 1995, Official Report, column 238, included the number of homes owned by Government Departments which were empty on 1 April 1995, and targets for 1995–96 aimed at reducing the number. The table shows the number which were empty at 1 April 1994. Information is not available about the average length of time properties are empty.

Secondary Liquid Fuel (Burning)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to stop the burning of secondary liquid fuel in cement kilns where there is persistent plume grounding. [1985]

Mr. Clappison: No. The Environmental Protection Act 1990 already provides sufficient controls for each site to be judged on its own merit.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Atkins) if the letter sent by the right hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 13 June constituted the Government's reply to the second report of the Environment Committee on the Burning of Secondary Liquid Fuel in Cement Kilns (HC 479) of session 1994–95. [1987]

Mr. Clappison: The letter contained initial comments and indicated that the Government would be considering and responding fully to the committee's report.

Air Pollution

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment at what level of ozone his Department issues health warnings. [1794]

Mr. Clappison: EC directive 92/72/EEC on air pollution by ozone sets a population information threshold of 180μg/m^3 or 90ppb and a population warning threshold of 360μg/m^3 or 180ppb. If either of these thresholds is exceeded, the directive requires member states to inform the public.

In the United Kingdom, my Department provides information on levels of ozone and other pollutants through the air quality helpline, the Internet, Ceefax, Teletext and the media. Ozone levels are described as "poor" when over the population information threshold, and very poor when over the population warning threshold. In addition, my Department and the Department of Health issue occasional press notices.

Both the helpline and the press notices contain appropriate health advice when air quality is poor or very poor.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the number of (a) rural and (b) urban areas covered by air monitoring stations; how his Department determines each; and if he will make a statement; [1808]

(2) what is (a) the number of air monitoring stations currently in operation, (b) the percentage of the country covered by air monitoring stations and (c) the percentage of the population covered by air monitoring stations; and if he will make a statement. [1810]

Mr. Clappison: The Government have established a number of air quality monitoring networks to monitor air pollutants in rural and urban areas. The number of monitoring stations currently in operation in each of the national networks is shown in the table.

About three quarters of local authorities in the United Kingdom—based on 1993 boundaries—have at least one air quality monitoring site in their area. These sites are either wholly funded by the Government or run in collaboration with local authorities. Since the majority of monitoring is undertaken in urban areas a significant proportion of the population are covered by air quality monitoring.

The objectives of the Government's air quality monitoring programmes are to understand air quality problems in order that cost-effective policies and solutions can be developed; to monitor compliance with European Community directives; to assess how far guidelines and targets are being achieved; to provide public information on current and forecast air quality; and to assist the assessment of personal exposure to air pollutants. The Government establish air quality monitoring sites to meet these criteria, drawing on advice from their expert review groups.

Further details of the Government's monitoring programme are given in "Air Pollution in the UK: 1993–94", a copy of which has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

[1] Not all sites monitor all pollutants.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what comparisons his Department has carried out of the levels of (a) ozone, (b) nitrogen dioxide and (c) sulphur dioxide in the United Kingdom and other parts of Europe. [1806]

Mr. Clappison: My Department does not compile statistics of the measured concentrations of ozone, nitrogen dioxide or sulphur dioxide in countries outside of the United Kingdom. A summary of all UK monitoring data for these pollutants is presented in the Department of the Environment, "Digest of Environmental Statistics No. 17, 1995", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the latest available figures for carbon dioxide emissions for each member state of the EU and the EEA, together with the equivalent figures for 1990; and if he will indicate the targets which have been agreed internationally for reducing them. [1792]

Mr. Clappison: The framework convention on climate change, which the UK ratified in December 1993, commits developed countries to adopt policies and take corresponding measures aimed at returning anthropogenic emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to their 1990 levels by the year 2000. The UK is on target to meet this commitment.

The table gives figures for carbon dioxide emissions by EU member states and EEA countries in 1990 and 1993, based on data published by the International Energy Agency.
